> Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what article of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may therefore admit or not, as it shall deem best, the importation of ardent spirits. And, inasmuch as the laws of Congress authorize their importation, no State has a right to prohibit their introduction.

The opponents of this measure have made an attack on it upon the ground that it is lacking in uniformity, because, they say, that the laws of the different States prohibiting or regulating the sale of intoxicants are unalike. I think they derived a confused notion because of the taxing power of the Federal Government. The Constitution says:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, * * * but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Of course this has always been held to be a geographical uniformity in the matter of taxation. The taxing power is quite a different power from the commercial power of Congress. The commerce clause is in this language:

> The Congress shall have the power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

Could not the same objection of nonuniformity have been urged against the Wilson law, the constitutionality of which was upheld? It will be remembered that the Wilson law is in the following language:

> That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Let me repeat what Chief Justice Fuller said about the Wilson law of 1890, and that is that its purpose was—> simply to remove an impediment to the enforcement of State laws with respect to imported packages in the original condition in the absence of specific utterances on the part of Congress.

And to this let me add that this particular measure is simply further to "remove the impediment to the enforcement of the State laws in respect to imported packages in the original condition in the absence of specific utterances on the part of Congress" by now making a specific utterance that the importation of liquor into a State for illegal purposes is prohibited. Let those who believe that each State has a right to regulate its domestic affairs, to carry out its own internal policy, cast their vote for this measure, whereby the Federal Government is to take its protection away from those engaging in the wrongful traffic of selling liquor contrary to law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired. The previous question is ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken on the committee amendments en grosse.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the committee amendments be voted on en grosse. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment, submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend, line 12, page 2, by striking out the period and adding:
> "Provided, That nothing contained in this bill shall be so construed as to prevent any citizen of the United States from purchasing, ordering, or having shipped, or to prevent any common carrier or agent thereof from accepting, receiving, transporting, or delivering spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind in reasonable quantities, when the same is plainly marked on the outside of the package 'for personal use': Provided further, That no common carrier or agent thereof shall make such delivery to any person, whether marked 'for personal use' or not, if the person ordering the same has been convicted of violating the prohibition laws of any county, State, or municipality, if the fact of such conviction appears of record in the courts of record in the county or parish where such shipment is to be delivered by the common carrier or agent thereof; or to any person who holds or possesses a Federal license or tax to retail spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind; or if the courts of record of such county or parish show that the person ordering such spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind has been convicted of public drunkenness."

The SPEAKER: The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACKMON) there were—ayes 55, noes 149.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-nine gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to taking the vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen have risen.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Oh, there is evidently a quorum present. The count shows a quorum. Not a sufficient number have risen to order the yeas and nays. The vote on the amendment was—ayes 55, noes 149.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands tellers. As many as favor taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-seven gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2 by Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia: Amend by adding, on page 2, line 12, after the word "prohibited," the following:

"And whoever shall knowingly ship, transport, or deliver to any common carrier for shipment or transportation or shall knowingly cause, induce, or procure to be shipped, transported, or delivered to any common carrier for shipment or transportation from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, with intent to receive, possess, sell, or use the same therein, or to cause, induce, or promise the same to be received, possessed, sold, or used therein, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of the laws of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to, but subject to, the jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than 2 years or both."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 214, answered "present" 6, not voting 82, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. SPARKMAN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 3, by Mr. BARTLETT: Add at the end of the bill, on page 2, the following:

"Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed to render illegal or subject to State control the interstate shipment of liquors, herein defined, into any State or Territory or District to anyone for his personal or family use.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 167.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will please rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Forty-six gentlemen have risen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number.

Mr. BARTLETT. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] demands the other side. Those opposed to ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-nine gentlemen have risen. On this vote the ayes are 46 and the noes are 199—not a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the next amendment, and then the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 4, by Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia: Amend by adding at the end of the bill the following:

"But nothing in this act contained shall be construed to forbid the shipment or transportation of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind intended for sacramental purposes or for the personal use or consumption of the owner or consignee thereof."

The Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, by Mr. SAUNDERS, as follows:

Unless such shipment or transportation is contrary to the local law of the place of delivery.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 5, by Mr. JACKSON: On page 2, line 12, add at the end of the bill:

"Provided, That the courts of the United States shall have no jurisdiction to issue any injunction or restraining order against any State or county officer acting under the color of his office, or in any suit in which the good faith of any act of such officer is challenged."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment. The Chair desires to say that the rule is that any gentleman desiring a division shall rise and address the Chair. A gentleman sitting in his sent and demanding a division puts the Chair to a disadvantage. He can not tell who makes the demand, or anything about it, and besides, it is not permissible under the rules. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out everything after the enacting clause and substituting the following:

"That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CURLEY. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HELGESEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. It turns out that there are two more amendments here that ought to have been voted upon before that substitute was considered. The Chair did not know that they were here. The Clerk will report the first one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 7, by Mr. SABATH:

Strike out, after the word "spirituous," on line 4, page 1, the following words: "Vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating," so that it would read: "That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous liquor of any kind from one State"; and on page 2, line 1, strike out, after the word "spirituous," the words "vinous, malted, fermented, or other."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 8, by Mr. MANN:

Strike out the word "intoxicating" wherever it appears before the word "liquor."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANGLEY. So do I, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this bill will vote "yea" when their names are called, and those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 239, nays 64, answered "present" 5, not voting 73, as follows:

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

VISITORS TO THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment as visitors to the Naval Academy Messrs. TALBOTT of Maryland, WITHERSPOON, and ROBERTS of Massachusetts.

INDIGENT PERSONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 267) providing for assisting indigent persons other than natives in the District of Alaska, and I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays that bill before the House. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, Mr. HARDY, and Mr. LANGHAM.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I addressed the House on the rule to-day. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the rule. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. I want it understood that I may perhaps touch upon the subject matter of the bill, although my remarks in the House to-day were on the subject of the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SIMON NAGER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18425) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Simon Nager, with a Senate amendment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request for a change of reference of a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28655) authorizing the payment of damages to persons for injuries inflicted by Mexican Federal or insurgent troops within the United States during the insurrection in Mexico in 1911, and making an appropriation therefor, and the same is hereby referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, as I understand that bill is in the nature of a private bill concerning claims growing out of the trouble in Mexico. Under the rules of the House neither the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce nor the Committee on Foreign Affairs has any authority to report a private claims bill.

The SPEAKER. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. That is a private bill, and the rules provide that such a bill can be sent to the proper committee without bringing it before the House.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit, is that a bill to provide for payment of damages to the persons who were shot in Texas?

Mr. MANN. I believe that is the case.

Mr. COOPER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has already considered a bill of this character, and some of the claims included in it have been referred by the chairman of that committee to a subcommittee.

Mr. MANN. That may all be, but the committee can not report it under the rules of the House.

Mr. COOPER. It has already agreed to report a considerable number of exactly similar claims, and the remainder are now being considered by a subcommittee.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has no jurisdiction to report a private claim.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will permit me, these are not what is ordinarily understood as private claims. They are claims, in effect, against Mexico, and which involve our relations with that country, and they can not in any way properly be brought to the attention of the Mexican Government except by the presentation of the claims to that Government by our State Department after they have been paid by the United States. If the Mexican Government then agrees to accept as just the aggregate that we have paid the claimants, it will, on principles of comity, I presume, as is customary in such cases, vote to reimburse the United States Treasury by the same amount; but if the Mexican Government should not so agree, then there will be an opportunity for it to ask that the matter be sent to The Hague tribunal. It is plain that the Committee on Foreign Affairs is the proper committee to which to refer matters of this character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the rule upon this subject:

No bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following-named committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. KENDALL. I think the controversy arose through certain injuries that were inflicted on persons on the Mexican border. The State Department took cognizance of it and undertook to negotiate through the diplomatic sources, and then a resolution was passed by the Senate appointing a tribunal to investigate the circumstances, and that tribunal has made its report.

Mr. MANN. Where is the report?

Mr. KENDALL. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. It was referred to the Committee on Claims in the House.

Mr. KENDALL. It has been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whether legitimately or not I do not know. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have been taking testimony and examining into the matter, with such light from the State Department as it could acquire.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Foreign Affairs would have jurisdiction on a matter that related to a claim against Mexico, but the Committee on Foreign Affairs has no jurisdiction to consider claims against the United States, and ought not to have.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks this claim stands on the ordinary plane?

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Claims has frequently reported claims in behalf of foreign citizens, recommending payment by the United States.

The SPEAKER. But this is the claim of a foreign Government.

Mr. MANN. Against the United States.

Mr. KENDALL. To be presented against Mexico.

Mr. COOPER. It is primarily against Mexico and not the United States. Neither the Government of the United States nor any of its citizens injured these persons or permitted them to be injured.

The SPEAKER. One thing is clear about it, and that is that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no business with it.

Mr. MANN. The rules provide how a private bill wrongfully referred shall be changed, and it does not require action by the House.

Mr. COOPER. The whole question is whether it has been erroneously referred. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that this is a claim against the United States. The bullets were Mexican bullets fired across the border, killing and wounding persons on our soil. Primarily the claims are against Mexico, but the only way to get them before the Mexican Government is for our Government to ascertain what damage was done, pay for it, and then, through the State Department, present to Mexico a diplomatic request for reimbursement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to examine the bill to see what is in it and form his opinion about it. One thing is certain, and that is the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary question. I have just come in and I would like to know what the question is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon taking the bill from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and referring it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It was erroneously referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] claims that it would be equally erroneous to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Two or three members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs claim that that committee has a right to it.

Mr. COOPER. I say that, properly speaking, this is not a claim against the United States. After the amount has been paid to the claimant by the United States the State Department will present it to Mexico and Mexico will reimburse our Treasury, so that at last the United States will not really have paid anything.

Mr. MANN. It must first be a claim against the United States before it is paid by Mexico.

Mr. COOPER. No. It is a claim against Mexico, the amount of which is first ascertained and paid by the United States, in order that a proper demand may be made upon Mexico.

Mr. MANN. The determination of several resolutions that have been introduced would be to fix the liability upon the United States, and I do not think it ought to be so fixed.

The SPEAKER. How can they fix a claim upon the United States for damage done by Mexico?

Mr. MANN. That is the purpose of the bill, to have the United States pay the claim, and that makes it a claim against the United States. Then we may whistle for the money, perhaps, as far as Mexico is concerned.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim that this is a private bill?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. When was the bill introduced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask that this matter go over until next Monday.

Mr. MANN. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I will object to the request to change the reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Upon what subject?

Mr. RAKER. Upon the bill that has just been passed.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to the extension of any remarks upon the bill that was passed to-day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 9, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. PEPPER].

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, in whose all-encircling love we dwell, through whose never-failing ministrations our existence is continued moment by moment, hour by hour, guide us, we beseech Thee, by the Holy Spirit of Truth to do Thy will, that we may build each for himself a character which shall be an everlasting memorial to Thee. We are here in memory of three great men whose lives have become a part of the Nation's history. We can not add to or detract from their glory, but we may exalt ourselves by recording faithfully their service to State and Nation. Comfort, we pray Thee, their friends, colleagues, and those near and dear to them by the bonds of kinship with the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul.

Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act that each to-morrow
Find us farther than to-day.

Inspire us with courage, zeal, and fidelity that we may be worthy and pass on to the reward of those who, true to themselves, reflect in thought, word, and deed the character of Him who taught us to pray: Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the Journal will be approved.

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HUBBARD, OF IOWA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order of to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, February 9, 1913, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. ELBERT H. HUBBARD, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 822.

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of the Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his public career the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I rise with deep feeling of trepidation on this occasion; a feeling due to consciousness of my inability to speak fittingly and adequately of the life and character of the man to whose memory we are all anxious to pay tribute of honor. My want of confidence at this time is not attributable to the absence of knowledge on my part of his splendid faculties, accomplishments, and attainments, or want of familiarity with his admirable character and lovable disposition. An acquaintance extending over a score of years, during which period I was privileged to come in frequent contact with him as a neighbor, as an honorable public servant, and as a brother at the bar, gave ample opportunity for me to discern and appreciate both his unusual faculties of mind and his noble impulses of heart. It is rather realization upon my part of his deserving and commendable qualities that forces acknowledgment of my want of command of language to fittingly describe them.

I am also deeply impressed with a sense of recollection of the almost tragic circumstance of his untimely taking off. After nearly eight years of service in this House, and when the time had again recurred for the people to pass judgment upon the faithfulness of his stewardship, by popular vote he was accorded a fifth nomination—a distinction never before conferred upon any man by the electors of his district. With the closing of the polls at the popular primary election on the 3d of last June he repaired to his home apparently in good health and without outward evidence of concern touching the result of the ballot. Indeed, he seemed inspired with a confidence wholly unaffected by any sense of apprehension.

I had been his opponent in the contest then at a close, and I shall always treasure with deep feeling of satisfaction his expression of gratification made just before retiring to his home over the fact that our campaign had been one of the utmost good feeling and wholly devoid of any circumstance calculated to cause regret.

After returning home and partaking of his evening meal he walked down the street a short distance to spend the evening with a neighbor almost directly across the way from my own home. After conversing with his friend a few moments he was taken suddenly ill of acute indigestion. He grew rapidly worse, and the seriousness of his condition was soon apparent. He lingered through the night, and in the early morning expired in the arms of his son.

Appalled by the force and suddenness of the shock the whole community gave over to lamentation and sense of deepest sorrow. The passing of ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD affected with a sense of personal bereavement his fellow citizens far beyond the circle of his immediate friends. Coming to the young city of his father's adoption when but a child, he became fused with the personality of its earliest generation, and his life was contemporary with its entire history. His personality was striking, bearing immediate evidence of distinctive character; his impulses were so high and generous, his sympathies so broad, and his mind so tolerant as to challenge the admiration and affection of all who were privileged to know him. Endowed with such qualities, though modest almost to a degree of diffidence, he never wanted for friends to speak in his behalf.

Mr. HUBBARD was peculiarly a product of his home city. Born at Rushville, in the State of Indiana, August 19, 1849, he came a few years later as a small boy to Sioux City, where his father had settled as one of its earliest pioneers. His preparatory education was completed in the Sioux City public schools, and at the age of 19 he entered Yale College for the completion of his general education. From that institution he was graduated with the class of 1872, and, returning to Sioux City, took up the study of the law. In due time he completed his course and entered upon the practice of his chosen profession. For 30 years before entering this House he maintained high position at the Iowa bar. The discharge of his professional duties was characterized by marked ability; and while vigorous and persistent in maintaining the cause of his client, he never disregarded the established ethics of his profession. His conduct at the bar was not only marked by a recognition of that high respect due to the court, but that gentlemanly courtesy to his brother lawyers which graces the orderly management of judicial proceedings.

During the period of his professional career there were a number of intervals when he put aside his private affairs in response to the call of his fellow citizens to perform important public service. As early as 1882 he served as a member of the House of Representatives of the Iowa Legislature, and again in 1889 in the Iowa Senate. His public service in the legislature of his State, as in this House, was always characterized by that marked ability and fidelity by which he secured and held the respect and gratitude of his fellow citizens.

Were I to assign preeminent distinction to any of Mr. HUBBARD'S lovable traits of character, it would be to that code of manners observed by him in his relation to the members of his family. From him wife and children always received that solicitous consideration, that anxious desire for convenience and comfort, that deep sincerity of love and affection which will constitute a lasting heritage of loving memory. But with all this there was no mark of selfishness; his kindly demeanor was not reserved for those who were near and dear; to all with whom he came in contact he gave that consideration of kindly respect which marked the refined gentleman. To the poor—to those who toil—he was most generous in his regard; and all those whose privilege it has been to know his character will gratefully acknowledge his fraternal nature.

Yea, brother of all the brave millions that toil;
Brave brother in patience and silent endeavor,
Rest on, as the harvester rich from the soil,
Rest you, and rest you for ever and ever.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, standing by the open grave into which the remains of his only brother were about to be committed, the most persuasive orator of our day, perhaps of any day, solaced the agony of his tortured heart with this philosophy:

Yet, after all, it may be best, just in the happiest, sunniest hour of all the voyage, when eager winds are kissing every sail, to dash against the unseen rock, and in an instant hear the billows roar over a sunken ship.

The mortality record of the Sixty-second Congress has been unprecedented in the parliamentary history of the Republic. Six Senators and 19 Representatives have responded to the final roll call in this Capitol, and have been transferred to augment the uncounted quorum in the world invisible. The passing of these colleagues has been of especial significance to me, because within the year circumstances personal to myself have made me understand, as I never understood before, that "the night cometh," and that "no man knoweth the day nor the hour."

The death of HUBBARD was certainly unexpected, but we can not be sure that it was untimely. He was so completely equipped to live that he was perfectly prepared to die. The inexorable messenger who can not be denied beckoned him apart just when the inducements to life were most alluring, just when the possibilities of service were most expansive, just when the approval of friends was most unmistakable. The entire community was profoundly shocked by the suddenness of the summons, but we can not presume to challenge the dispensations of a Providence which orders with infinite wisdom all the destinies of men. For our sufficient consolation we must realize that the "Almighty has His own purposes," and that "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

I first became acquainted with our departed friend when we were elected, he to the senate and I to the house in the Twenty-eighth General Assembly of Iowa. The personnel of that legislature was exceptional in ability and experience, and many of its membership have since been elevated to positions of responsibility and eminence in the State. It was a company of men earnest of conviction, vigorous of intellect, resolute of individuality, and only the fittest might be ambitious to survive. HUBBARD early assumed a leadership which he maintained unquestioned until the session was dissolved by adjournment. In that more limited arena he developed the qualities which commanded his promotion to this wider theater of endeavor, and here I was privileged to resume relations with him when I entered the Sixty-first Congress in 1909. I loved him from our introduction in Des Moines with an affection which deepened and intensified as the advancing years revealed the genuine nobility of his admirable character.

He was a courageous man. He denounced the intolerance of the régime which formerly dominated the House majority, even at the peril of exclusion from party fellowship. He attacked the prerogative which then attached to the Speakership when it was inevitable that his independence would be punished by the autocracy he antagonized. He sustained the President in his program for reciprocity with Canada when all his Republican colleagues from Iowa rejected the proposition; and he repudiated the Payne-Aldrich bill as a betrayal of party pledges, although it had the unqualified indorsement of a powerful Executive.

He was the proprietor of his own convictions. He would not accept a measure simply because it was proposed by the organization, nor resist it simply because it was favored by the opposition. It is not difficult to define the political creed to which he subscribed. He was a Republican, but always with him partisanship was subordinated to patriotism. He was determined that his party should become and continue the progressive party of the Nation. He knew that it was instituted not to make men rich, but to make men free, and he insisted that it must never renounce the exalted impulse which Abraham Lincoln lived and died to communicate to it. In any conflict between men and money, between people and property, his voice and his vote were for humanity. He believed in the direct election of Senators and in a graduated income tax. He believed in the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, accompanied by appropriate restrictions. He believed in protection as a cardinal policy, but always with tariff duties so adjusted that prosperity for the producer should go hand in hand with competition for the consumer.

He believed that in this democracy equality of opportunity must be sacredly preserved. He believed that the people of this country, white and black, rich and poor, great and small, must control it absolutely in all its departments. He believed that in the adoption or abrogation of organic compacts, in the enactment or repeal of statutes, in the designation or displacement of officials, the electors themselves must be the ultimate authority. He believed that in this age of arrogance and wealth the helplessness of the weak must be protected against the aggressions of the strong. He believed that every citizen in the land must be assured an untrammeled ballot for the nomination of his party candidates, so that the real preference of the rank and file of the voters shall be reflected in the results. He believed that the Constitution must be made a potential force in governmental life, cheerfully recognized and universally respected, by the removal of every unnecessary impediment which interposes between the people and its amendment after fair deliberation. He believed that the dangers of combination and monopoly must be overcome by restoring to the market place that unhampered independence and reasonable rivalry which alone can countervail the abuses of industrial, commercial, and financial concentration. He demanded that the course of the Republic be so directed that the disinterested intelligence of the many rather than the selfish genius of the few shall sound the dominant note in the national strain. These were the principles he espoused. Many of them were unpopular when he embraced them. Most of them are now applauded everywhere.

His life was open, unconcealed, obvious. He intended no evil, and he was therefore reluctant to impute evil even to those who willfully misrepresented him. He endured the criticism, much of it misinformed, some of it malignant, which all successful men are compelled to encounter; but it never aroused his animosity or disturbed his composure. He never provoked a controversy, but he never surrendered a conviction. The opinions he entertained were formulated for his own government after serious consideration, and while he never attempted to impose them upon his associates, he would not relinquish them no matter how bitterly they were assailed.

He was a man of extraordinary modesty. His political career was signalized by singular prosperity, but with vanity he was wholly unacquainted. He enjoyed the unbounded confidence of his electorate, and he had been commissioned and recommissioned as the representative of a sovereign Commonwealth in the most distinguished legislative assembly in the world. But he always esteemed the distinctions conferred upon him as opportunities for useful achievement in the public interest, and he remained throughout what he was originally—a simple, sincere, unaffected gentleman. And he was a natural gentleman. I knew him intimately for a dozen years, in public station and in private life, in his office and in mine, in his home and in mine, and our intercourse was informal, even familiar. I never heard him utter a word in conversation that would be offensive to sensibilities the most fastidious, and I believe he never conceived a thought that might not have been published, without impropriety, in any presence.

He had no partiality for public life, because he comprehended how capricious is the approbation of men and how puerile are the preferments which the most fortunate can secure. He was devoted to wife and children and fireside and friends, and he contemplated early retirement to his home, and to his library, and to his profession.

He had a fine appreciation of art, whether expressed on canvas or in marble. He would stand for hours engrossed in Saint Gaudens's marvelous representation of "Grief" in Rock Creek Cemetery, and he once confided to me that, after all the pictures in the Corcoran Gallery, he returned instinctively again and again to view with awe and reverence Vela's majestic statue of Napoleon, in the upper corridor, and Michaelangelo's wonderfully impressive figure of the Pieta, near the entrance.

His literary discrimination was acute, cultivated, critical. Shakespeare he knew and cherished as a friend. Kipling was often in his hand. Browning was always on his table. Dickens was like one of the family. Tennyson was a constant companion, and the last time I saw him in Washington he concluded our interview by reciting with dramatic effect from that solemn masterpiece, "Crossing the Bar":

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me.
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark.
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

I can not suppose that he had a premonition of the approaching end, but as he finished there was the shadow of a tear in his eye and the suggestion of a tremor in his tone. He paused a moment, abstracted in reverie, and then began repeating that immortal poem of Leigh Hunt's:

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold:
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the Presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made all of sweet accord,
Answered, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spake more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again with great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

He finished, and we clasped hands in a final farewell. I shall remember him always as he appeared that last afternoon—gentle, serene, hopeful, courteous, radiating the delightful urbanity which endeared him to all. Within the month he had "crossed the bar," had seen "his pilot face to face," and had been written "as one who loves his fellow men."

The foremost poet of Bible time, possibly of all time, in the anguish of his spirit exclaimed, "If a man die, shall he live again?" The answer has arisen for centuries spontaneously from the human heart. We can not know when or where or how, but we do know that sometime, somewhere, somehow, if we are worthy to be numbered with the good, the just, and the true, we shall be permitted again to meet and greet our friend for whom we mourn to-day.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, more frequently than heretofore we are called upon to engage in these memorial exercises. The mortality of this body seems to grow greater with each recurring year. One year ago it would not have been expected that during this Congress it would be necessary to show our evidence of respect for the memory of Mr. E. H. HUBBARD. He was then in the apparent enjoyment of excellent health, with as good chance for a long life as any of us. But his fate was that of many others; he was called hence when it was least expected. Mr. HUBBARD was an exemplary man—but few are found whose lives are more so. He was a man who was slow to make personal friends, but everyone who knew him testifies to his personal worth. He lacked the element of personality which advertises and makes conspicuous. He was retiring and modest in demeanor. He had a long tenure of service here and showed at times superior ability but without demonstration. Men learned to know him for what he was, for he was entirely devoid of pretense and never paraded his superior ability. He was not brilliant in speech, but was convincing in statement. In Congress he made few addresses, and those he did make were on the merits of measures before the House. He never sought popular applause by trying to reach the galleries, but was contented to address himself to his colleagues on this floor. He was a man of splendid natural ability and had made himself a student of public questions. He was a man of strong convictions and was conscientious in the advocacy of what he believed to be right. He was an honest man and a useful citizen, and his life was an incentive to better things.

Mr. Speaker, this good man has gone into the beyond. His body so carefully consigned to earth may crumble into dust, but his spirit lives now and shall ever live. The philosophy of life is in death. Man's origin and development may be shrouded in mystery; his habitation and dominion in point of time may be unknown; his destination may be more of speculation than knowledge; man may not be able to explain the phenomena of life or the effect of dissolution; men may not agree as to the meaning of death or man's fate beyond it, but the certainty of its coming can not be doubted. The Bible story of man—his purpose and his future—presents the only solution of his existence. Here he may be to-day in the enjoyment of health and strength, to-morrow he may be cold and lifeless. Why this change? Humanity can but demonstrate the fact of what has happened; only infinity can explain it. Our friend, in the enjoyment of health, was cut down in the twinkling of an eye in the zenith of his power and before his mind and body had begun to weaken. Why this extraordinary condition? Why this irony of fate? A few months ago he sat in yonder seat, but never again will he answer an earthly roll call nor rise at the signal of the Speaker's gavel.

What of it all? Is life worth living? Is man's short stay amongst men compensation for the sorrow of separation? Ask wife and child was Mr. HUBBARD'S life worth its cost in pain, anguish, and heartache, and you can be sure of the quick response, "A thousand times, yes." Ask the mother who bore him, and whose anxious heart beat over his little form, who nurtured him until he was wholly grown, "Was Mr. HUBBARD'S life worth the cost," and she would promptly answer, "It was." I ask his friends, at home and here, what of Mr. HUBBARD'S life? Was it for good or ill, for sunshine or for sorrow, for uplift or injury? Can it be said that his life was in vain, or was it a benefaction? I feel I can safely say there comes this response from all: "His life was worth the living."

What is the measure of human greatness? Is it in strict integrity, honesty of purpose, fidelity to truth, good training in mind and morals, devotion to duty as one sees it, splendid integrity, observation of filial, marital, and moral obligations? Then Mr. HUBBARD may be classed amongst the great men of earth. Here we know men by the little things they do—by their actions in committees, their conduct on this floor, and their personal demeanor elsewhere. We say of this man, "He is honest;" of that one, "He is brilliant;" and of another that he possesses a splendid character, applying almost as many descriptions as there are men; but, so far as I have ever heard, Mr. HUBBARD was regarded as a man of superior intelligence, good judgment, and strict integrity.

Another forceful example is here presented of the uncertain tenure of life and a splendid warning to us to be prepared when our summons comes. None of us knows when the call may be made. Let us hope that every individual here—the loved ones of Mr. HUBBARD and his friends generally—in thinking upon his life may receive inspiration from his good deeds and splendid example, and may all be encouraged to better living by reason of their association with him.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, when I became a Member of the Sixty-first Congress one of the first men with whom I became acquainted was E. H. HUBBARD. We immediately became friends, and from that time to the day of his death were very intimate. We both belonged to that wing of the Republican Party first called "Insurgent" and later "Progressive," and therefore upon public questions of great moment were thoroughly in accord.

Of his early life and career others have spoken. I only desire to briefly give expression to my opinion of him as a legislator and affection for him as a man. I need not say to any Member of this House that he was a man of marked ability and power, for they all know that to be the case. When he arose to speak there was immediate attention and Members came in from the corridors. Everyone knew that when he arose he had something to say and that his speech would be profitable to listen to.

Being a profound lawyer with a deep sense of practical justice, scorning technicalities, he was at his best when discussing legal principles and their application to legislation. He was especially well equipped to distinguish between provisions of law and court procedure which aimed to secure justice and those which resulted in its obstruction. The first he always defended and sought to extend. The latter were his implacable foe.

He was a modest man; one of the most modest that I ever knew. He never sought to push himself forward and very often yielded to others to give expression to views and policies that he had been largely instrumental in formulating. This was especially marked in the consideration of the bill amending the interstate-commerce law enacted in 1910.

Members of the Sixty-first Congress will remember that the bill was the subject of very extended discussion. It was the habit of a group of Members, of which he was one, to meet nearly every evening in my office to prepare and consider amendments to the bill. His ripe experience and great ability were invaluable upon those occasions; but when it came to the presentation of these matters upon the floor he insisted that some other Member should take the lead. He was always ready and prepared, however, to assist and speak whenever the occasion seemed to require it. As illustrating this great modesty, I remember an occasion upon another bill when he and I discussed some features of it and found our views as to certain amendments to be in accord. I urged him to speak upon them, feeling certain that he could convince the House as to the correctness of our position. He said he would consider it. I saw him go up to the Speaker. In a few moments he returned, came over to my desk, and said: "Mr. LENROOT, the Chair has just promised me to recognize you next, and I want you to present the matter."

He was a Republican; but in every act and in every vote in this House he considered his duty to his country higher than his duty to his party. Upon any matter that arose there was but one question in his mind. That question was not whether it was a Republican measure or a Democratic measure, not who favored it or opposed it, but the sole question was whether it was right and in the interest of the people that it pass; and if his conscience answered "yes," he would vote for it, even though he stood alone.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the highest type of American citizen. That is the type of men that we increasingly need here, and the example and influence of our friend as a Member of this House has done much to create higher standards of thought and action in the deliberations of this body.

He was my friend. He was the friend of every Member with whom he came in contact. Of him it can be truly said:

None knew him but to love him,
None named him but to praise.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, it was not long after the opening of the extraordinary session of Congress, nearly two years ago, that I had the pleasure of meeting for the first time our departed friend and colleague, Mr. HUBBARD. I was not intimately acquainted with him, although I had the pleasure of his association and company on quite a number of occasions, and had not only been more or less observant of his work in Congress but of his characteristics as a man as well.

There are others here much more familiar with the achievements of his long and honorable public career than I, as well as the inborn qualities that made that career possible, and I shall therefore leave a discussion of these matters, in the main, to those better able to do justice to them. His father before him was a distinguished jurist and an honorable Member of this House; and it is said that the son, as it was but natural for him to do, experienced peculiar pleasure and pride in following his father's footsteps to the halls of national legislation. For the fourth time he was elected and for the fifth time nominated by a critical and discerning constituency to a seat in this body—the greatest of its kind on earth. When after eight years of continuous service a Representative here has been renominated for two more years by the political party largely responsible for his former elections, that of itself is very convincing, if not conclusive, proof not only of his ability as a national legislator but also of his unswerving fidelity to that trust.

Mr. HUBBARD was originally sent from and continually returned to Congress by the district in which he had been born and reared, and by the constituents who knew his life and character best. In the eyes of the world a man may have a good reputation or a bad reputation, and whether good or bad it may be wrong. The place to get at what a man really is, the place to discover a man's true character, is from those among whom he has lived and mixed and mingled—those with whom he has been thrown in daily contact. They are the best judges of what a man really is.

They are the only true judges, and judged from that standard the life and character of ELBERT H. HUBBARD is above reproach. He was repeatedly trusted and honored by those who knew him best, and he was ever faithful to the trust imposed. He was independent in thought, independent in action. He put patriotism above party; the welfare of his constituency above his own. The truth is strikingly exemplified by the votes he cast contrary to the wishes and will of his constituency at the time, but which later proved to be for their permanent good. He was inherently honest. He voted not to please but to benefit. He was willing to take the consequence of every honest and honorable act, whether at the time understood or misunderstood, and leave it to time to vindicate him and his motives. But he is now with us no more. As a superb specimen of physical manhood, moving with poise and deliberation among his fellow men, bravely doing the duties and cheerfully meeting the responsibilities of life, he is no more. He is dead. But how little of the good and great that can die? He will live forever in the minds of all who knew him and in the hearts of a grateful constituency.

Peace and death's beauty to his heart to-day, who is not dead, but only gone away to sleep a little, as a child who goes when twilight frees the petal of the rose.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, the State of Iowa is noted for its great agricultural resources, second to none in the Union. The Creator, in His infinite wisdom, created within its boundaries a magnificent land, a country bounded by great rivers. Throughout its confines flow mighty streams, boundless prairies meet the eye, and splendid groves are interspersed to make the scenery beautiful to mankind.

No wonder, then, that the early settlers who came to the Territory and State of Iowa said: "This is the land for me and my family."

They saw this land, its fertile soil, its splendid streams, its magnificent resources, and they realized that it would become a veritable garden, an earthly paradise.

The struggles of these pioneers is the story repeated over and over again of the people who have converted by dauntless courage, integrity, and energy the virgin soil of the West into the fairest and best-producing agricultural lands of our country.

These pioneers brought with them the Bible, the spelling book, and the reader. They established churches, schools, and colleges.

As they developed and tilled the farms, built towns, cities, and constructed roads, they did not forget that education of their children was as necessary as the gaining of wealth, and they remembered to give their loved ones the priceless privilege of becoming educated, esteeming the value of education higher than the mere gaining of wealth.

As a youth I took an humble part in the development of Iowa, coming to the State in May, 1869, and remaining in Iowa until 1880, when I removed to my adopted and beloved State, Nebraska.

I knew personally some of its growth, especially west of the Des Moines River, then in its new development. I saw the virgin soil turned to the sun, the crops planted, the harvests gathered, the towns and cities built, with their churches and schoolhouses, railroads constructed, and the region become an empire of splendid homes.

At that time the district, a part of which was represented by Congressman HUBBARD, was known as the sixth, "the big sixth," comprising what is now known as the tenth and eleventh districts, a vast domain in extent, a mighty land to improve. To this district there came young men who have made their names famous and have rendered useful service to the State and Nation.

Iowa has been the home of great men from its earliest history; its men have been foremost in every line of activity and usefulness; its educators are widely known; its editors have achieved national fame; its clergymen have taken leading places amongst the divines of the land; its warriors have been mighty in battle; and its statesmen have ranked with the foremost in the high councils of the Nation.

When I came to Iowa, Senator Harlan was in the zenith of his influence; Senator Grimes's memory was still fresh in the minds of the people on account of his distinguished services in the Senate of the United States. And in the House of Representatives Iowa was represented by Allison, Kasson, Wilson of Fairfield, Price, Grinnell, and Hubbard (the father of the man whose memory we commemorate to-day). These were familiar household names in Iowa and the Nation. They were great men, leaders of thought, and they rendered distinguished service for their country. During these days Governors Kirkwood and Carpenter, now gone to their final reward, were the Republican leaders of Iowa.

It was Congressman HUBBARD'S privilege to see his beloved State develop into an empire. He took a prominent part in its growth and development. Living his life within its boundaries, he knew its resources better than most men. He not only knew, but helped develop, helped to make its history, and assisted in making its laws. Keeping close to the wishes of the common people, he became highly respected for his great ability, and they loved him for his usefulness.

I became acquainted with Congressman HUBBARD first at Sioux City, at a waterways convention. The Congressman believed that the great Missouri River should and could carry on its waters great fleets to transport the commerce and agricultural products of the Missouri Valley. He believed that the Missouri River could be made a mighty factor in transportation matters and lent his great influence to attain this most worthy object.

In this and other conventions I saw the great strength of his character, I noted his common sense, his method of doing things. Then, later, meeting him here in Congress, I observed his attentive manner, his close application to duties. I do not wonder that his people believed in him, elected him, time and time again, to represent them in legislative halls, both in his State and in Congress.

When the history of Iowa is fully written it will be related that in the northwestern part of the State there have been able and faithful men serving in Congress. Among the names of men who served in this body I recall Pomeroy, Orr, Oliver, Holmes, men who served their State and district faithfully, all of whom I had the honor to know personally. Judge HUBBARD was a worthy successor of these men and, like his predecessors, a man of the common people, strong, able, and conscientious. He was of the rugged type; growing to manhood among the pioneers of Iowa, he shared their joys and their sorrows, he knew their difficulties, and he lived to share their triumphs and success. In a word, "He made good."

The large attendance of the best citizenship of Iowa, the vast concourse of neighbors and people who attended the funeral of Judge HUBBARD to render their tribute of affection to his worth, attested the high esteem in which he was held by his people.

The life work of Congressman HUBBARD is ended, but the memory of his usefulness to his State and his country will live, and—

> To live in hearts we leave behind
> Is not to die.

His was a useful life. He gave his best to his people; for this they loved him.

With loving hands they laid him away in a beautiful resting place close to the scenes of his life's labors, near the city he loved and where he had been such an important factor in its growth and citizenship.

> There is no death; the stars go down
> To rise upon some fairer shore,
> And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
> They shine forever more.

Mr. WOODS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is something necessary more than mere ability, riches, or personal achievement to perpetuate a man's memory. Though nature may bestow talents that are unusual, though energy and industry may compel passing recognition, though position has been attained that has lent power, and good fortune carried him to the highest pinnacle of fame, yet, if such a one lack human sympathy and a fellow feeling for mankind, the memory of his triumphs and successes will soon pass into oblivion. But when a man is found who possesses as a foundation to his talents a generous nature, a willingness to assist his fellow beings, a combination of heart and intellect, it forms a personality that leaves an indelible mark on those he comes in contact with and the world at large recognizes his true worth that his personal modesty can not hide and the malignity of a jealous, selfish world can not obscure.

ELBERT H. HUBBARD possessed a nature that was lovable, a kind and courteous disposition, and a quiet, unobtrusive manner. He had a faculty of making friendships that were lasting. A thorough student, he was careful and painstaking with any problem confronting him. He was cool and logical in debate, and in presenting an argument in favor of his position never became offensive, though earnest and aggressive. He took great pride in everything he did. He was proud of the principles he advocated and never allowed personal ambition or the fear of criticism to swerve him from what he considered right. Mr. HUBBARD was always loyal to his friends and ever ready to assist in a good cause. He was successful in his profession, was a credit to his district and to the country in his capacity as a lawmaker. He had a pure heart, a loving disposition, a generous appreciation of others, and a modest opinion of self. His chief concern was for the common people, and he gave of his time and talent to the end that the Government by the people, of the people, and for the people shall endure. His untimely death was indeed a loss to the Nation and a personal bereavement to every Member of this House, but the memory of his tender kindness and beautiful character will be one of our dearest recollections.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, how often we are called upon to pay our tributes of love and respect to the memory of departed associates. During this Congress alone 18 Representatives and 4 Senators have answered the final summons. Death has indeed laid a heavy toll on our membership. Their tenure of service has varied from a few months to many years. Some, just entering on this wider sphere of activity, were pressing forward with ambitious hope to greater usefulness. Others, privileged to serve for a period of years, had become identified with both the membership and the work of the House, and left their impress on our national affairs. Others had climbed high up the ladder of fame and were in the very zenith of their power, with great possibilities still before them. They have come from the various elements which go to make up the composite whole, each contributing in his own way to the finished product of legislation under which the greatest Nation in the world has been moving forward.

But no matter what their place here, or the distance of the horizon that bounds their name or fame; no matter how poignant the sorrow, or how deeply felt the loss; as each and all have passed away, the ranks have closed and Congress moved on. Great men have died at every period in our history, but no matter how great or beloved or potential, the Government does not pause. The legislative powers of our ninety millions of people are, under the Constitution, vested in Congress. Individual Congresses may adjourn or recess, but the Congress of the United States lives on. Its work is never completed. There will always be unfinished business before it.

Others who were associated for a longer period in this body with Mr. HUBBARD have spoken of his distinguished services here, and recounted his participation in the important contemporaneous legislation. I do not know that I can add anything to their tributes to his worth and service as a legislator. It is said that Cromwell selected his "Ironsides" from "such men as had some conscience in what they did." All will bear testimony that Mr. HUBBARD was a conscientious man. This trait was displayed in everything he did or said. He was guided by deep emotions, earnest convictions, and a sincere desire to serve the people. He had high ideals and a pure and lofty conception of the trust imposed upon a public servant.

His rise was steady rather than meteoric, which reflects the esteem in which he was held by those who knew him best. A lawyer by profession, through ability and work he made an honored place for himself among the bar of his State. Called to represent the constituents of his home county in the house of representatives in Iowa, his service in that body was such that he was later chosen to the senate of his State, where his services were so preeminent as to merit the wider responsibility of election to represent his district in Congress—a district comprising 13 counties with a population of approximately 250,000 people. He was elected to Congress four different times, and on the day of the evening on which he died had been renominated by his party as their candidate for another term. These continued and repeated evidences of confidence and esteem by a quarter of a million of people to whom he was known so well and with whom he had been closely associated for many years of his life are the highest tribute to his worth and character.

A few years ago, when an assassin's bullet struck down our lamented McKinley, beautiful indeed were the tributes of love and respect which came from a shocked and loving people. He had held many positions of trust and discharged them with fidelity and ability. His name had been associated and identified with policies and measures prominently recorded in the history of our country. And yet I recall how all of his achievements on the field of honor, in the halls of legislation, in the public forum, in the Chief Executive's chair seemed to have been set aside as the public mind turned instinctively to the sweetness and beauty of his home life. What was true of McKinley is equally true of the departed friend and associate whom we commemorate to-day.

Mr. HUBBARD was devoted to his family. His home life was ideal. He was fond of history, poetry, music, and art. His home was the center of culture and there he found his greatest happiness. He enjoyed the society of his friends and liked to have them gather at his home. There his true qualities of mind and heart were shown to best advantage. He was gentle, affable, and kindly in his ways, sincere in his feelings, inspiring in his ideals. He was genuine. He will long be missed by those who were privileged to dwell within his hospitable friendship, and his memory will be a priceless heritage to his family.

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with Mr. HUBBARD was limited. I had not known him until the first session of this Congress. Short as it was, this acquaintance was sufficient to impress upon my mind the worth of the man and the force of his character.

We are living in an age devoted to the accumulation of wealth and a constant desire for the spectacular. The homely virtues of right living, of thorough integrity, and a consideration for others are too often forgotten unless so paraded before the public as to lose much of their value.

Mr. HUBBARD'S life was in itself a sermon and a creed, yet he never preached or talked. A gentleman in the highest sense, he was kindly to others, considerate to all, and showed malice to none. His private life was without a blemish and his integrity unquestioned. The splendid prizes of the financial world had no allurements for him. He had an extensive practice as a lawyer and long service as a public official. As an attorney he had frequent opportunities to enrich himself in a manner that would have brought no reproach, but in professional and official life it was not sufficient for him to satisfy the law or accord with custom. The rule which he adopted was controlled by his conscience.

He who simply treads the path of duty is not likely in the ordinary course of events to have his merits fully known by the public. Mr. HUBBARD was unpretentious and led no vainglorious life. While his career was not dazzling it was infinitely more useful than many another which has been loudly acclaimed by the public and the press. His work was done faithfully with no loud-sounding advertisements and no flourish of trumpets. The busy world does not, can not, understand the loss it has sustained when such a man passes away. It is therefore most fitting, Mr. Speaker, that we should meet here to commemorate his virtues. Some time, when those who later read the history of the worthy men of our State, examine the record which we have made here, they will say: "This was a just man; a patriotic citizen; a faithful legislator; a man of large heart, of generous mind, of broad views; who lived, not for himself alone, but for all mankind."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I was not so fortunate as many of those who have spoken upon this occasion as to have a very intimate personal acquaintanceship with Mr. HUBBARD. When I came to Congress I recollect meeting him among the early days of the special session. I recollect with a great deal of pleasure the absolute independence of thought on the part of this distinguished man. My nearly four years of service in this House has made me very much less of a partisan than when I came. I fully realize that there are Representatives on the other side of the aisle from that upon which I sit whose patriotism is just as great, whose devotion to the country is just as great, as any of those gentlemen sitting upon this side of the aisle.

It seems to me that we are now reaching a period in our country's history when the party lines are being greatly shattered, and, being an optimist, I feel that whatever may occur to the political parties as they now exist, that out of it all the American people and this Republic will emerge brighter and stronger. I do not believe that any man living, when he attempts to measure the success of his life by what he has accumulated, can say that his life is a success. There is, there can be but one successful life, and that is a life of service. I do not care what field of labor one may occupy. I care not whether his avocation be one that is considered in the eyes of men a high and great avocation or not. If he devotes his life unselfishly to the betterment of humanity his life is a success. The hod carrier who devotes himself to unremitting toil, with a full determination that in this line of work he shall succeed and shall endeavor to make mankind better, is as glorious a success as though he occupied a position in the mind's eye of the world.

Mr. HUBBARD always impressed me when he came to consider a public question that he could and did lay aside all of his partisanship; and while he was a Republican, he never permitted a Republican organization or Republican leaders to do his thinking for him. And his example to me and others here has had an influence not only on that side of the aisle but on this side of the aisle, and I desire to indorse from my knowledge of him all that his friends from Iowa have said of him. And I believe that in their description of him as a man and individual at home they have not exaggerated his good qualities and his good character, because the earnest I saw of him here justifies me in the conviction that they have not overdrawn the picture.

Mankind worships at the cross of Christ because his was a life of service. Just as a man can pattern his life by that life it is a success. When the spirit of altruism shall fill the hearts and minds of people at both ends of this Capitol, and of all of those who shall occupy offices of trust in this Nation, and can have their ideas and their minds thus unselfishly directed to public questions and filled with that spirit of the Master, we will be able then, and not until then, to properly solve all the great matters of State.

I believe that the ethics of a people should always be in advance of the laws and the legislation of a people. I believe that when a people reach that point where their ethics are not in advance of their business and legislative code, that people have reached a point where they will not rapidly make advancement. And the ethical code of the distinguished Member of this House upon whose bier I would lay a flower was high. It rose above all the partisan strife, not only in his own State and in the Nation, but above the parties and strife in this House.

Courage is not only displayed on the field of battle, amid martial music, rattling musketry, and belching cannon. It requires more courage on the floor of this House to submit to the jeers of your party leaders and submit to the criticisms of a partisan press than it does to die on the field of battle. Mr. HUBBARD had this sort of courage. He was willing to submit to criticism in order that he might submit to the dictates of his own conscience. I believe he was an ideal Member in this respect. And in paying to him this tribute, with a full knowledge of his seven years' service, I know that he was all that I say he was. And I would to God that every Member on both sides of the center aisle would voice their consciences and their judgments with the same courage, with the same convictions, with the same patriotism, and with the same full consideration of the public welfare that Mr. HUBBARD did.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, ELBERT H. HUBBARD was born at Rushville, Ind., on August 19, 1849. With his parents he removed to Iowa in 1857. His early education was obtained in the common schools of Sioux City. At the age of 23 he was graduated from Yale College.

His father, Asahel W. Hubbard, was prominently identified with the beginnings of Sioux City. He built the first hotel and organized the first railroad company in that vicinity. He was a lawyer by profession, and was elected judge of the circuit court, which position he filled with distinction. From 1862 to 1863 he represented the Sioux City district in this House. It was a source of great satisfaction to ELBERT H. HUBBARD to represent the district in the Congress of the United States where he had lived practically all his life, and which had previously been ably represented by his distinguished father. He was a boy of 8 years when he became a resident of Iowa, and from that time to the date of his death his interests and sympathies were always closely associated with the building up and development of that part of the country.

Mr. HUBBARD loved his country and rejoiced in her victories and mourned in her defeats. He was but a boy in his teens when the wires flashed the news over the country of Lee's surrender, and it is related of him that in the demonstration that followed young HUBBARD joined in the celebration by mounting the tower of the Methodist Church and ringing the old church bell. Throughout his entire life he was moved to action by the noble and patriotic impulses of his nature.

Mr. HUBBARD'S legislative experience was not confined to his labors in this House. He was a member of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Iowa. Later he was elected to the State senate, where he served in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth general assemblies. He was a member of the house when the liquor question was decided by the Legislature of Iowa. He was again called to the service of his State when the great problem of the control of railways and corporations was before the Iowa Legislature. In Congress he took a prominent part in the fight to liberalize the rules of the House. It is thus seen that throughout his legislative career his tenure in each of the legislative bodies in which he served was at a time when his party was divided by internal strife. He was an able legislator, and in that capacity he served his State and country with credit and distinction. In every legislative act party ties were made subservient to the national welfare. A lawyer by profession, he occupied an enviable position at the bar of the State.

It is worthy of note that the great financial panic of 1893 had its beginnings with the disastrous failure of the Union Trust Co. of Sioux City. For several years the Union Trust Co. had been floating stocks, bonds, and other securities which it guaranteed. The notes of this concern and the securities which it guaranteed had been sold in practically every part of the country. When the crash came in April, 1893, banks in 24 States of the Union held the promissory notes of this company, aggregating over $7,000,000. In addition to this, stocks and bonds guaranteed by this company had been sold in excess of $50,000,000 more. The object of the Union Trust Co. was to build a city where there was none, and in a marked degree it succeeded. Practically every great interest in Sioux City was allied in some way with the Union Trust Co. Most of its great enterprises were started by it, while to others it gave financial aid and backing. It built and aided in the building of railroads, street railways, manufacturing establishments, packing plants, stockyards, and elevators. It platted additions, erected buildings, and in a large way handled real estate, and did everything that a big corporation could do in the way of building up the city. It was a stupendous undertaking. The failure of this institution spelled bankruptcy to dozens of the financial organizations of Sioux City. It was a gloomy day for that thriving metropolis. When the crash came the trust company and its creditors alike looked for some one who had the confidence of the community and who, at the same time, had the ability to straighten out the legal and financial tangles. ELBERT H. HUBBARD was united upon as that man. He was appointed receiver for the Union Trust Co. and wound up its affairs with marked ability.

It was in connection with litigation growing out of this great failure that the present Attorney General, Hon. George W. Wickersham, became acquainted with Mr. HUBBARD, and from that day to the time of Mr. HUBBARD's death there existed a very close, intimate relationship between the two men. On more than one occasion I have heard the Attorney General speak in terms of highest praise of the legal ability and honorable conduct of Mr. HUBBARD.

For several years previous to his death Mr. HUBBARD was a member of one of the great committees of this House, the Committee on Insular Affairs. He took a great interest in all the legislation coming before this committee, and was a deep student of every question referred to it. He rarely participated in debate on the floor of the House, but he was a good listener, and no member of the House was, as a rule, better informed as to the merits of a bill after it had been discussed on the floor than he. When the time for action came there was never any question in his mind what his duty was. For him to know his duty was to perform it.

He loved nature and spent most of his spare time in strolling through the woods. He was a familiar figure in Rock Creek Park. He took a lively interest in everything that he saw or heard during these walks in the woods. How frequently have I heard him tell of the good times he had had in his long walks in the park. Who of his close friends have not heard him say of these tramps in the woods, "Great fun"? His home life was ideal. He was essentially a home man. Club life had no charms for him. He was an idealist, a dreamer of dreams. His idle moments were spent in communion with nature or in the companionship of his charming family. Surrounded by loved ones at home, his everyday life was most beautiful. The Almighty gave our lamented colleague a big heart. His was an affectionate nature, and his heart was always in the right place. We miss his counsel and advice. We miss his pleasant smile, his cheerful and cordial greeting, his brotherly companionship.

O for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, again we have met to pay the last tribute to one we loved. Again we are assembled around the open grave of one of our own number. We have met in blessed memory of a friend and brother who but yesterday, in the possession of all the faculties of a vigorous manhood, stood out among us as a model worthy of the emulation of the best. We can not think of him, we can not read of him, we can not remember him, we can not emulate him without improvement. Judge HUBBARD was one of God's noblemen. The elements of manhood were so intermingled in his make-up that his very life will always remain an inspiration to all those who knew him. He was vigorous and determined, he was unflinching and courageous, and through it all he was gentle, modest, and true. He never betrayed a friend and never took advantage of an enemy. As measured by the span of the ordinary life his work was far from completed. At a time when his usefulness was the greatest the awful summons came. Many years of still greater achievement, it seemed to his friends, lay before him; and yet, without notice and without warning, he was stricken down while the sun was in its zenith. And oh, how does his sudden taking off remind us of others of our number who were called before. Before their work has been completed they have been compelled to lay their burdens down and obey the sudden and solemn call. When humanity needed them most they have been called to answer the final summons. Before their grateful fellow-citizens had learned to appreciate their work and their worth and give to them the honor and the reward that their work and their labors had entitled them to receive, eternity's gates swung open and we were deprived of their wisdom, their leadership, and their counsel. In this respect Iowa's loss has been greater than any other State. It seems but yesterday that Dolliver was called, and now to-day HUBBARD is gone—both summoned in the same way, while in the prime of their manly vigor and strength. Such instances almost cause us to doubt the wisdom and the justice of Providence, and, if this life were the end of it all, such doubt would be resolved into a certainty. But to me it is another reason for my faith that beyond this world of pain and grief there is a brighter, happier life, where the wrongs of earth will be righted, where tears of sorrow will never flow, where broken hearts will never bleed, where—

No grief shall gnaw the heart
And never shall a tender tie be broken.

And what of that life beyond? Is it a place where punishment shall be meted out to weakened mortal man for sins committed here?

Will death change me so
That I shall sit among the saints,
Turning a deaf ear to the sore complaints
Of souls that suffer?
Methinks, God pardon if the thought be sin,
That a world of pain were better, if therein
One's heart might still be human, and desires
Of human pity drop upon its fires
Some cooling tears.

We have it in Holy Writ, spoken through the lips of the Master himself, that the Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but peace, love, and joy. It is beyond the power of the human mind to solve the mystery of death. In the awful shadow of its wing man stands helpless and appalled. No mortal eye can see, no mortal tongue can tell what lies beyond, and yet we have a satisfied, abiding faith that beyond it all there is a future life for man. And when the awful summons comes to us it will be with that faith, with that hope, with that belief—aye, with that conviction that, with unfaltering step and without a shudder or a fear, we can enter the mist, the darkened cloud that conceals from mortal eye the peace, the joy, the love, the blessings of eternity.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, soon after my first arrival in Washington it was my good fortune to meet the late Judge ELBERT H. HUBBARD. Immediately I knew him to be a sincere man of strong character. After I became better acquainted with him I came to know him as an excellent and able counselor. There are many problems that arise in the performance of the duties of office upon which a new Member needs the advice of one who is tried and experienced. I quickly recognized in Judge HUBBARD a man of the character that one could absolutely rely upon. On several occasions I went to his office in order to consult with him, and found him to be most judicious in passing his opinion on subjects requiring consideration.

Judge HUBBARD was progressive in the true sense of progressiveness. He knew the limitations of men and was practically and not radically progressive. He stood for those things that aid toward the betterment of conditions that affect mankind. He possessed the judgment that makes of men true statesmen.

The saddest that I have felt on seeing the draped desk of a departed Member was on the day when I saw it draped for Judge HUBBARD. It was the first information that had come to me of the closing of his life's valuable service to his country. But there was still left to his country the good of his past services. Perhaps a personal incident that I recall will give light on that statement. Those of us who try hard to meet the demands placed upon us get but little chance to make close personal acquaintances here. But occasionally we get a glimpse into the souls of our colleagues. One evening I called on Judge HUBBARD, and he was reading a poem written by J. K. Bangs. After he completed its reading he handed it to me. It was:

That part of me that from the earth hath come,
Let earth take back again when comes the hour
That makes of my achievement the full sum
And sets the limit to my feeble power.

I grudge no bit of it—the loan of clay
That from her breast I've ta'en I shall return,
And have no slight reluctance to repay.
Nor ever think the debt incurred to spurn.

But that which of the spirit is in me
Let no earth-creditor of me demand;
To earth give earth's, to immortality
The gift divine from the Immortal Hand.

Judge HUBBARD has given back to earth the clay. The results of his work as a statesman live on for the betterment of mankind—"the gift divine to the Immortal Hand."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD was born in 1849. He was 62 years old when he died. He was a graduate of Yale College and a lawyer by profession. He early settled in Iowa and served both as a representative and as a senator in the general assembly. He was elected as a Representative in Congress in 1904 and served about seven years and until his death.

He was a man of the cleanest character and most exemplary life. There are those we know whose character is always challenged, who must struggle to maintain it, and who keep it only at the sword's point. Not so with his. No one ever challenged it; no one ever impugned it; no one ever doubted it. He was inherently, instinctively, temperamentally clean and pure. He was honest without effort, personally and politically.

I knew him personally only two years, but during that time our association was quite close. Although we often differed, I learned to greatly admire his fine character and high ideals. If I were asked to name his most distinguishing characteristic I think I should say simplicity and candor.

There is no more admirable trait in man that a noble simplicity. In this age when the character of many is so enigmatic that their original elements can not be divined, it is refreshing to find a simple nature, clear and transparent as a limpid streamlet. The greatest truths are the simplest, and so are the greatest men. Emerson said:

Nothing is more simple than greatness; indeed, to be simple is to be great.

This fine trait ELBERT HUBBARD possessed. He was simple and unaffected as a child. He had no thought of obscuring an issue or of concealing a thought. He did not desire to mystify, but to clarify. He was not a lover of darkness, but of light. He stood in the clear sunlight himself, and for the dragons of the caves he had neither admiration nor fear.

Closely allied to this is another most admirable trait of character, candor. Candor is the seal of a noble mind. A small mind or a dishonest one can not be candid. Dissimulation ever marks the swindler and the scoundrel. Deceit is the desire of little minds, the defense of the depraved, and the most useful weapon of the wicked. But candor is the mark of purity, for only the pure can be candid. This most admirable trait was marked in ELBERT HUBBARD. It did not need to be affirmed of him, because it was apparent. It shone from his eye, and—on his unembarrassed brow nature had written "gentleman."

I do not think ELBERT HUBBARD was ambitious, certainly not in the selfish sense. He was only desirous of doing his duty and being of service. If in doing this, distinction came, it was welcome. But he had no thought nor desire to force the issue, to press forward—

Treading the thorny road
Which leads through toil and hate to fame's serene abode.

His was the contemplative mind. He did not seize a thought and hurl it rough and ponderous toward its goal. Rather with patient care he sought it out with meditation, and with utmost pains he fashioned it, and then with steadfast purpose sent it speeding toward its goal. He loved the old themes and the old books,

The past's incalculable hoard,
Mellowed by scutcheoned panes in cloisters old,
Seclusions ivy-hushed and pavements sweet
With immemorial list of musing feet.

It would be thought that with these characteristics he would have been out of tune with this pushing, radical, inconoclastic age. But he was keenly and ardently abreast of the foremost thought, alive and sympathetic to the changing temper of the times. A strange combination this, a conservative radical. Ideally that is what we all should be; keeping abreast of the progress of the age and bearing our part in its onward march, and yet holding fast to the treasured richness of the past and never yielding judgment to passion or to impulse.

Most of this virtuous and blameless life is hidden from us in modest privacy. But that which is revealed gives token of the richness and the worth reserved for those who knew and loved him best. We speak of the news of unexpected death as a stroke. And so it is. Out of the unseen comes the arrow of death, and out of the unseen comes the flash of a sad intelligence that smites the heart sometimes with sorrow deeper than the dart of death. To those who knew him best no news of death could have been more unexpected. He was seemingly so well, so happily alive, so glad in the very hour of political victory that when the news came of his death it came with double force. But there is a consolation, if not a blessing, in sudden death. To those who knew him best he will not be recalled as a saddened, suffering figure, but he will stand forever in the halls of memory as he stood in life, vigorous and strong in the maturity of manhood; a fine type of that which is best in American life.

Peace, Peace! he is not dead, he doth not sleep—
He hath awakened from the dream of life—
'Tis we who, lost in stormy visions, keep
With phantoms an unprofitable strife,
And in mad trance strike with our spirit's knife
Invulnerable nothings. We decay
Like corpses in a charnel; fear and grief
Convulse us and consume us day by day
And cold hopes swarm like worms within our living clay.

He has outsoared the shadow of our night;
Envy and calumny and hate and pain,
And that unrest which men miscall delight
Can touch him not and torture not again.
From the contagion of the world's slow stain
He is secure, and now can never mourn
A heart grown cold, a head grown gray in vain;
Not when the spirit's self has ceased to burn
With sparkless ashes load an unlamented urn.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD'S neighbor, Mr. SCOTT, and friends who knew him longer and better than I did have related in detail his life story and commanding incidents of his private and public career; hence in my brief tribute to his memory I shall not undertake to particularize, but to speak of him as I knew him in our brief personal acquaintance—not as a function or formal duty, but out of a heartfelt affection for that noble man. Though I knew him intimately for only a few years, yet having lived in the same house with him for a year, and here in Washington where our duties brought us in frequent contact, I had an opportunity to know and study his grand life, his splendid character, his noble qualities and purposes so manifest in every walk of life, both public and private. Like in most great and good men, we had in Mr. HUBBARD, generally known here as Judge HUBBARD, a plain, simple, unassuming, unpretentious, and unselfish man. "Simplicity belongs to greatness." A man of sterling qualities, of loving disposition, eminently sociable, pleasant, courteous, obliging, loyal to his friends, with a character founded on integrity, with a will to work his way honestly and bravely, endowed with lofty ideals, fortified with wealth of learning, pursuing his duty with industry, fidelity, unyielding courage and fixity of purpose, always shunning deceit and cunning practice. The better I knew him the more I adored him, the more I loved and realized why his constituents trusted him, and why he was held in such high esteem by his many friends. His neighbor and lifelong friend, the Hon. John C. Kelly, recently, in a letter to me, said:

As time passes here there is coming to be universal agreement that he was a sounder, safer, and stronger man than his political friends or enemies could appreciate when they were measuring him by an ideal.

In our State Judge HUBBARD occupied a position in the foremost ranks of his profession. Noted as a counsel, as an advocate with an unfailing fidelity to his clients, as a legislator with unfaltering faith in rectitude of purpose, dominated by lofty ideals, naturally through his fidelity to his clients, his constituents, and his State he gained distinction and popularity. Coming to Congress as he did, with his genial disposition, keen intellect, noble character, and experience in legislative work, coupled with his patriotic, active, and effective public service, his unswerving and unusual devotion to truth, to the best interest of his State and Nation, always evident in his performance of public duty, naturally won him distinction and many friends. Few Members of Congress have gone to their graves more universally loved and mourned by their colleagues than our worthy friend, Judge HUBBARD. I had the honor to be a member of the committee which attended his burial services in his home city. I was deeply impressed by the regard evidenced by the great number of sympathetic friends who came for the last time to look upon the face of that departed friend. In his departure his excellent family sustain the loss of a loving husband and devoted father. The State of Iowa and the Nation lost a most worthy, respected, and patriotic citizen.

While I realize that it is not in my power to utter words that will fully allay the great sorrow experienced by the members of his family, yet it is comforting in this hour to point to a life so bright, a character so pure, and to one with such noble qualities, splendid career, and record as a statesman and citizen; to say that while he has departed from the world of sickness, pain, sorrow, and adversity, we sincerely believe that he has gone to one of happiness, brightness, and peace, and to know that his grand life has made the world better and added to its happiness.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, never will I forget the scene in the great church at Sioux City last June at the funeral of ELBERT HUBBARD. Every foot of room in that spacious building was crowded by those who came to do honor to his memory, and outside were hundreds of others who could not gain admittance. All sorts of folk were there—the rich, the poor, politicians and philanthropists, business friends and social friends, the cultured and the ignorant, youths and old men. Everywhere were flowers heaped by willing hands, roses and lilies, violets and forest leaves, woodland blossoms, tender and fragile, and immortelles. The music of the great organ rose and fell, the voices of singers relieved the hushed expectancy. And as I looked about at that great and mixed assemblage the thought came, this truly was a man of the people.

This is how ELBERT HUBBARD always appealed to me—a man of the people. A true representative of the prosperous, intelligent men and women among whom he lived and among whom he died in so unexpected, so dramatic a fashion. What more can be said of him, what higher tribute can be paid to him, than that he typified the virtues, the hopes, the affections, the ideals, aye, the failings, of that numerous and sensible class of Americans who are the real makers and owners of this great Republic, and in whose continuance abides the hope of its future.

The people of his district should raise a shaft—a granite shaft—to mark his grave, and on it should be inscribed: "He was one of us."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to allow this occasion to pass without adding a brief tribute to the memory of ELBERT H. HUBBARD.

My acquaintance with our friend and colleague, ELBERT H. HUBBARD, dated from my entrance to this House two years ago. From that time until his sudden and untimely death I learned to admire and respect him as a courageous and independent public servant and as a genial, kindly friend.

One trait of his character impressed me from the first; that was his unqualified devotion to what he conceived to be his duty. It seemed to me he was remarkably free from partisan bias and prejudice. When it came to voting in the House of Representatives I was struck oftentimes with his complete independence and abandonment of party regularity.

I think in his later life he had reached an attitude of mind where he felt unwilling to allow any partisan thoughts whatever to enter into consideration in connection with his public work.

I think during the time I served with him in the House, although we were on opposite sides of the big aisle, our votes were recorded together oftener than otherwise.

To my mind Mr. HUBBARD was a true progressive. He saw with a vision remarkably clear the present condition of the public mind. He realized at the time the unrest and dissatisfaction of the people with conditions as they have existed for some time.

He was a profound student, a deep thinker, a philosopher. He hated sham and pretense and was a lover of truth.

To these attributes I should add those of frankness, reliability, sincerity, straightforwardness, plain dealing, all modes in which truth, a divine attribute, develops itself.

I do not recall of hearing Mr. HUBBARD speak except very briefly on one or two occasions. At these times, however, he spoke with force and convincing power.

I sometimes think it is rare to find a man who can speak out the simple truth that is in him honestly and frankly without fear or favor. But with Mr. HUBBARD, either in private conversation or in public discourse, his speech conveyed to me always a conviction of absolute sincerity.

His public career covered a period of 13 years—6 years in the State Legislature of Iowa and 7 years in the Congress of the United States. At the time of his death he had just been triumphantly renominated for the fifth time as a candidate for Congress.

He had reached that period in his congressional career when his influence was felt in every matter to which he gave attention.

I am glad to have known Mr. HUBBARD. His life and public record have been and are an inspiration to me.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members who may desire to do so have leave to print for the next five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, in order that the RECORD may further show the esteem entertained for Judge HUBBARD by his many friends, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from the Sioux City Tribune of June 7, 1912, and the Sioux City Journal of June 8, 1912, and also the address at the funeral of ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD at the First Presbyterian Church, Sioux City, Iowa, by the pastor, Wallace M. Hamilton, D. D.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the extracts and the address referred to:

[From the Sioux City Tribune, June 7, 1912.]

VAST NUMBERS PAY LAST RESPECTS TO CONGRESSMAN—FLOWERS BANKED HIGH NEARLY HIDE THE BIER OF ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD.

Like a shadow,
Softly and sweetly thrown from a passing cloud,
Death fell upon him.

Ringing clear, like a tone from a silver bell, these words from the lips of Rev. Wallace M. Hamilton, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Sixth and Nebraska Streets, fell upon the ears of hundreds of friends, nation wide, who gathered this afternoon for the final rites over the bier of Congressman ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD.

Scarcely distinguishable in the midst of a luxuriance of roses, lilies of the valley, smilax, ferns, and carnations, the minister pronounced the words so that they could be heard distinctly from the farthest corner of the church auditorium.

To the solemn tones of Beethoven's funeral march, played by Prof. O. A. Morse, organist, the casket was borne to its place directly before the pulpit. The Hubbard family, including relatives, occupied the small choir room at the right, while the first five rows in the auditorium proper were reserved for the congressional delegation and the Woodbury County and Sioux City Bar Associations.

FLOWERS PILED HIGH.

To the right of the pulpit stood a colossal crown and base of American Beauties, sweet peas, and Easter lilies, the gift of the official congressional committee. On the left was a large anchor of roses, Easter lilies, and carnations, given by the two local bar associations, while heaped about the altar and inset about the platform rail were cut flowers of every description sent in by organizations and friends. The pulpit was wrapped about with white rosebuds given by Sioux City friends. An immense box of cut pink and white carnations and American Beauty roses was received from the Iowa delegation in Congress. The Commercial Club, local merchants, and lodges about the city were also represented in a wealth of floral grandeur heaped about the altar. The Erodelphian Society of the high school sent in a design of pink and white carnations.

During the service the Presbyterian Church choir sang "Rock of ages" and "Lead, kindly light." At the close, Chopin's funeral march was played by the organist.

The first five carriages in the procession to Floyd Cemetery were occupied by the family and relatives, the next three by pallbearers, and the following three by the congressional delegation. Immediate friends followed.

A. B. FUNK PAYS HIGH TRIBUTE TO DEPARTED LEADER.

SPIRIT LAKE, June 5, 1912.

Hon. JNO. C. KELLY,
Sioux City, Iowa.

MY DEAR MR. KELLY: I am stunned by the death of the noble HUBBARD.

You and others may have known such thing might be, but I had not seen him since I was in Washington, some months since, and was wholly unprepared.

He had fought a good fight and kept the faith. The old district had just grandly sustained him in his fidelity to lofty political ideals. The State and country needed him in his clear conviction, high courage, and undaunted conscience. "Take him for all in all, we shall not look upon his like again."

His death is to me a personal loss, but knowing how you two were bound by many ties, I know few friends are so much wounded as yourself. And my heart bleeds for his devoted family. Like "the shelter of the rock in the weary land" was his great heart to those nearest and dearest. I have not communicated with Mrs. Hubbard. May I ask you to assure her of my deep and abiding sympathy? Am very sorry I am not able to be at the funeral Friday.

Sincerely, yours,

A. B. FUNK.

COUNTRY HONORS HUBBARD.

Sioux City, Iowa, and the Nation yesterday paid final honor to Congressman ELBERT H. HUBBARD, deceased.

National respect for the late Congressman was extended by a delegation from the United States Senate and House.

The condolence of Iowa was expressed by the attendance at the funeral ceremony of nearly all the State colleagues of the late Mr. HUBBARD in the House, and by the presence of political and personal friends from various parts of the State.

Sioux City indicated sympathy to a marked degree, the auditorium of the First Presbyterian Church, where the ceremony was held, being packed to overflowing by friends and neighbors.

The long procession to the Floyd Cemetery began at 3.15 o'clock. Headed by the pallbearers and hearse, it was composed in order by the immediate relatives of the late Congressman, the members of the delegation from Washington, D. C., the members of the Sioux City and Woodbury County Bar Associations, and the friends of the family.

Active pallbearers were T. A. Black, F. L. Eaton, W. N. Ford, George S. Parker, William Gordon, and Judge William Hutchinson. The honorary pallbearers, chosen by the bar association yesterday, were Craig L. Wright, C. R. Marks, E. B. Spalding, J. L. Kennedy, T. G. Henderson, and Judge David Mould.

Congressman HUBBARD died about 5.30 o'clock Tuesday morning of heart disease, just as returns were beginning to come in which showed conclusively he had won the honor of the fifth consecutive nomination to Congress from the eleventh district. He was at the home of John C. Kelly, an old friend. His younger son, Lyle Hubbard, was with him at the end. Mrs. Hubbard was en route to Sioux City from Washington.

Address at the funeral of Hon. ELBERT HAMILTON HUBBARD, M. C., at the First Presbyterian Church, Sioux City, Iowa, by Wallace M. Hamilton, D. D.

Again we are reminded that all roads lead toward the cemetery. Thither have gone little children, the household idols; thither the playmates of earlier years; thither the aged and the infirm; and now one in the fullness of life. The Providence emphasizes the need more strongly than words "that our days should be numbered and our hearts applied unto wisdom."

When, on the morning of Tuesday, June 4, the spirit of Hon. E. H. HUBBARD took its flight, we were bereft of one of our most respected and useful citizens. The most admiring and loving friend could wish for his memory no higher tribute than a true portrayal of his life and character. And while the general facts of his life are well known to all of you, and will not be repeated here, yet it is natural and right at the close of every noble life that we place the flower on the casket, that we break the "alabaster box," that we recall the noblest and best of the qualities of the departed.

The simple tastes and quiet demeanor of our friend would exclude any unnecessary parade or eulogy from this service. Keeping in mind what would be his desire, we would indicate some truths that we should ever retain in our hearts. The stability of the conspicuous traits of his character suggested that they were inherited. The inference was supported by the concurrent testimony of those who had opportunity to know the virtues of his ancestors. With a good inheritance, and the opportunity of a college training, the success and honor which distinguished his career were due to a happy concurrence of favorable conditions. His mind was vigorous; his heart was true to humanity; his innate honor directed him. He was philanthropic in his impulses and was thus delivered from the temptation of the merely technical and saved to be a lover of justice and righteousness. These conspicuous traits of character, together with the ample development of his natural gifts, secured for him a position of leadership and of lasting and tender regard in the hearts of his friends. If intelligence, integrity, and courage are the pillars that support the State, then our community has had a good representative in the halls of legislation.

His home life was ideal; among his family and friends he was full of kindness and sympathy. My impression is that he was a member of no lodge or organization of men, but belonged to the community. Faithful in his profession and to the general public, but when his day's work was over he found his home the place of refuge and joy.

In political life he necessarily differed with many of his fellow men, but so far as I have been able to detect in conversation with him it was without malice or personal animosity.

His death, coming at the close of a successful campaign for renomination, was inexpressibly sad. The announcement cast a gloom over our entire city. Men in every walk of life felt they had lost a friend. His devotion to his family, his friends, and the public service was limited only by the boundaries of his life. He was human, and so there was weakness, but he has left the memory of a brave, honest man.

Like a shadow,
Softly and sweetly thrown from a passing cloud,
Death fell upon him.

God does not thus equip a life for these few years. We live in a world of reason. Our hearts and minds need another summertime for their unfolding. In certain conditions our minds may drive out at the door our belief in immortality, but when we do lose that belief it will come in again through the window of our hearts with the assurance that this is not the end. To deny the soul's survival is to charge folly upon nature and God. Mr. Emerson said, at the close of his life, "What I have seen of God's work in this world leads me to trust for that I have not seen; and whatever He has in reserve for us it must be something beautiful and in the grand style of His work." Sir Walter Scott, anticipating his death, and to comfort his children, placed as his last words in his journal: "And on the next morning—" and then the line broke off. He knew that dying was no "All hail and farewell," but rather "All hail and good morning." So we turn with confidence to the Bible, for it is the key that fits the lock and opens the future with fullness of light and assurance. Immortality is here no unemphatic assertion; it is here as a glorious vision; it is here as a conclusive argument; it is here as a revelation in the tangible embodiment in the grand personality of the risen and ascended Christ. He is now our way to an immortal hope. Before He lived and died, tombs faced the west. After Christ, tombs faced the east, for the sun had disappeared to stand upon the horizon again, clothed with untroubled splendor. There is a chamber in the catacombs, used about the time of Julius Cæsar, and every tomb has emblems of the skull and crossbones. Near by is another chamber of a later generation, and, lo, Christ's teachings have carved upon each stone a lily, eloquent of immortal hope. To-day our hearts are sad because of the loss of a friend, but our assurance is of eternal life. With gratitude for his useful life, and with deep sympathy, we reverently bow our hearts and heads and commend his bereaved family to the God of all comfort in this their hour of need.

THE LATE SENATOR WILLIAM P. FRYE.

Mr. GOULD assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. GUERNSEY, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, February 9, 1913, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, late a Senator from the State of Maine.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, I send the following resolution to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 823.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for the tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, late a Senator from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of memorial exercises of the day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Mr. Speaker, the career of Senator FRYE is not only eminent, but in many respects unexampled. For 40 consecutive years he was a conspicuous Member of the American Congress—10 years in the House and 30 years in the Senate. This is a length of service equaled only twice in the whole history of our country.

For 10 years before coming to Congress Mr. FRYE was a notable figure in the public life of his State. Commencing in 1861, he was elected for three terms as a member of the State Legislature of Maine; twice elected mayor of Lewiston, his native city; and for two terms filled the high office of attorney general, where his abilities as a lawyer won him renown.

I have said that his career in many respects was unexampled; so it was. It is well known that during Senator FRYE's public career there were strong men in his party in Maine who were active in the sphere of political life. High and important offices did not go unsolicited; yet in all the 50 years of his political activity, and notwithstanding the many high and important offices he filled, he never was obliged to make a contest for a nomination in his party for any position he ever held.

Another remarkable fact is that in his long career he never lost his hold, even temporarily, upon the confidence of the people of his State. Fifty years is a long period of political activity. In that time he saw his party in the political vicissitudes of the times meet with downfall and defeat. But the people never faltered in their loyalty and devotion to him, even to his dying day.

Furthermore, in these days of modern political machinery, it is worthy of note that Senator FRYE never depended upon a political machine, so called, for his personal political supremacy. He appealed directly to the people, placed his whole confidence in the people, and they in turn rewarded him with theirs.

Another remarkable feature of his public career was its pleasantness and freedom from bitterness. Enemies he had none; calumny never assailed him; envy and malice never threw their blighting shadows across his pathway. In the lengthening years of his life it was his great satisfaction to contemplate this feature of his career. It made him an optimist of the best type, with faith in his fellow man and hope and confidence in the future of his country.

He was intensely an American. His public life began with the breaking out of the Civil War in 1861 and spanned a succeeding period of 50 years—probably the most exciting, strenuous, and important period of our country's history. New problems of tremendous import were presented for solution. The period brought forth American statesmen of the highest type. Foremost among them was Senator WILLIAM P. FRYE, prominently identified with every great public question of his time. In the legislative hall and committees an indefatigable workers, and on the stump—the great educational forum of American politics—the irresistible orator.

As a platform speaker in a political campaign Senator FRYE had no superiors and few equals in his time. He had a wonderful power of taking a dry and intricate question like the tariff and making it interesting and clear to the average man. He could place himself in the sympathies of his audience quicker and more thoroughly than any man I ever saw, and at his will he could, by bursts of real eloquence, arouse his hearers to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

The great public knew the Senator as an orator and statesman. But as a citizen, neighbor, and friend he was at his best to those who were fortunate enough to be included in the circle of his intimate acquaintance.

There was an unaffected plainness and cordial sincerity about the man that had a peculiar charm. And yet there was a natural dignity about him that commanded respect and marked him as the cultured gentleman. All in all, he was one of nature's great men.

Maine has given many eminent statesmen to the service of the country. Her citizens have been proud to honor them

High upon her roll of fame posterity will write the name of the Hon. WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE, the matchless orator, the pure statesman, the wise diplomat, and patriotic lover of his country and mankind.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the delegation from the State of Maine on this floor I desire to offer a few remarks on the life work of one of the best types of American statesmen that has appeared in our national life. Others for a time have occupied more conspicuous places in the public mind only to have their lives blighted by disappointment, defeat, or death.

The statesman that I refer to, broadly speaking, never knew disappointment; he never knew defeat, and death overtook him only after he had long passed the time allotted to man. Such was the remarkable career of a remarkable man—WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE, United States Senator from Maine, who died at his home in Lewiston, Me., on the banks of the Androscoggin, August 8, 1911, aged 80 years.

For more than 40 years WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE was a commanding figure in the State of Maine and the councils of the Nation. For 10 consecutive years he was a Member of this House, and for more than 30 years represented his State in the United States Senate. Throughout his long public career at Washington he enjoyed to an extent almost without a parallel in American public life the constant, sustained support and ever-increasing confidence and respect of the people of his State. His personal strength with the people of Maine was universal. Brilliant as were the careers of those sons of Maine, the great Secretary of State Blaine and the great Speaker Reed, neither can compare for complete success with the life work of Senator FRYE.

Years ago, as a boy, I knew of him as a great political orator who charmed audiences from ocean to ocean. I heard him speak, and read his speeches with absorbing interest. In later years, when I better understood the great national questions he advocated and the strength of his position on public matters, I found myself in full accord with his views. As time passed on I became a member of our State legislature and had the opportunity to cast my vote in his favor on the occasion of his fourth return to the United States Senate.

When I became a Member of the National House of Representatives I went to him for counsel and aid, and not only did I receive the counsel and aid sought, such as could only be given and extended by a man in Senator FRYE's high position and unlimited experience, but he often extended unsought his helping hand not alone in acts of kindness, but often in matters of great public importance to me as a Representative and to my district.

When I called upon him for the last time, less than two years ago at his hotel in the city, I saw that the heavy hand of time was laid upon him and that his day had reached its twilight; yet even then he was the same kind-hearted, dignified, and determined man, looking straight into the future with no thought of looking back, even though his physical strength was fast vanishing.

Senator FRYE was born September 2, 1830, at Lewiston, Me., the son of Col. John M. Frye, a prominent and influential man in the early development of the present city of Lewiston. His great-great-grandfather, Joseph Frye, was a general under Washington in the War of the Revolution.

Senator FRYE was educated in the public schools of his home town, and at the age of 15 he entered Bowdoin College and graduated four years later in the class of 1850. He read law with William Pitt Fessenden, practiced law for a time at Rockland, Me., but later returned to Lewiston and became a partner of Thomas A. B. Fessenden. On the death of Mr. Fessenden Senator FRYE formed a partnership with John B. Cotton, who was afterwards Assistant Attorney General during the administration of President Harrison.

At the bar in his State Senator FRYE achieved success as a lawyer and soon became one of its acknowledged leaders. He soon, however, was called to broader fields, and in 1861–62 and 1867 was chosen to represent his city in the State legislature, serving also as mayor of Lewiston in 1866 and 1867. Political preferment seemed to crowd upon him and in 1867, while he was still mayor and representative in the legislature, he was chosen attorney general of Maine, and during the years 1867–1869 he conducted the important office with signal ability, winning a country-wide reputation in the trial of capital cases. In 1864 he was chosen as presidential elector. In 1872, 1876, and 1880 he was a member of the national committee from his State, and in 1880 succeeded James G. Blaine as chairman of the Republican State committee of Maine.

He entered the National Congress in 1871 as a Representative from what was then the second congressional district of Maine. In the Forty-second Congress he had as colleagues James G. Blaine, Eugene Hale, John Lynch, and John A. Peters, while in the Senate there were Hannibal Hamlin and Lot M. Morrill. Five times he was chosen to succeed himself as a Representative from his district, and served, in addition to the Forty-second Congress, in the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses, and undoubtedly would have been chosen Speaker in the Forty-seventh Congress had it not been for his promotion to the United States Senate.

In 1881 James G. Blaine resigned his seat in the Senate to enter the Cabinet of James A. Garfield as Secretary of State, and Representative FRYE was elected to the United States Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator Blaine.

In the United States Senate, as the successor of James G. Blaine, he fulfilled the highest expectations of his State and maintained his position on a par with that of his most illustrious predecessors. In 1883 he was chosen as his own successor for a full term by the State legislature, and likewise in 1888, 1895, 1901, and 1907. On the occasion of each legislative election the unanimity of choice in his favor was so complete that no voice, so far as I am able to learn, was ever raised against his candidacy within his own party.

The wonderful ease with which Senator FRYE continued in public favor until the day of his death was one of the striking features of his public life. On one occasion I am told that not long ago a prominent statesman asked the Senator if he were to live his life over whether he would follow the professional career in which he had been so eminently successful before coming to Congress or that of a public man such as he had been since he entered Congress, and the aged Senator replied that he would choose by all means the public service if he could be assured in advance of as comfortable time as he had always experienced so far as effort to hold his position was concerned.

Senator FRYE never had his time consumed or his position embarrassed by seeking for riches. Opportunities undoubtedly were presented to him whereby he could have advanced his fortune legitimately, but he is said to have remarked that he much preferred to put aside such opportunities that came to him through others, as he could not tell how soon return of favors might be suggested and which would embarrass him as to some public act that he should perform.

The service of Senator FRYE in the United States Senate is a record of devotion to duty to his State and Nation, it was brilliant and able. He served on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and for years was chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He became conspicuous in diplomatic matters, and one of the most prominent supporters of measures to increase and upbuild our domestic and foreign commerce.

On February 7, 1896, he was elected President pro tempore of the Senate, and reelected to that position March 7, 1901, and held the same until within a few months of his death, resigning from the position on account of failing health. In 1898 he was appointed a member of the peace commision which met at Paris to settle the final differences between this country and Spain growing out of the Spanish-American War.

During the long life of Senator FRYE he witnessed the making of a large portion of the history of this Republic, as well as taking part in making much of it.

He was born during the administration of Andrew Jackson—first term—and he became a voter during the administration of Fillmore. As a member of the Legislature of Maine in 1861 and 1862 his voice and vote were always in favor of upholding the Federal Government in its struggle to continue its life during those dark days in the early part of the Rebellion.

After he entered Congress he saw the administrations of Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur, Cleveland, Harrison, McKinley, Roosevelt rise, develop great governmental policies, and pass into history, and lived long enough to take part during a large portion of the present administration of President Taft.

As a member of the peace commission at the close of the Spanish-American War he favored the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, believing it was the duty of this Government to continue its control over those islands which had been captured in war, and that it would be cowardly for our Government to desert them, and, further, he believed that this Government was destined to grow and become a great world power. With William McKinley he was an empire builder.

Senator FRYE came near having presidential greatness thrust upon him, not once but twice. In the national convention of 1880 pressure was brought to bear for him to accept the nomination for Vice President. It was proposed to him before it was to Mr. Arthur. Had he accepted, the tragic death of President Garfield would have placed him in the highest office in the land, but he refused to allow his name to be used and Mr. Arthur was chosen in his stead.

In 1900 President William McKinley urged Senator FRYE to accept the nomination for Vice President on the Republican ticket with him, but the Senator was firm in his decision not to accept such position. At the time it is related that Senator FRYE said to the President, "Why, what if anything should happen to you?" The President replied, "Then you would be President, and no man is better fitted to be President than yourself." Thereupon Senator FRYE said that he would not accept the Presidency even if it were tendered to him on a plate of gold.

President McKinley, like President Garfield, met his death at the hand of an assassin and Theodore Roosevelt was elevated from the Vice Presidency to the Presidency. Thus twice did Senator FRYE put aside the possibility of being President of the United States. To him the most desirable position in this Republic was a United States Senatorship, and he wished to continue in his position as a Senator from his native State.

Senator FRYE's long service of 30 years in the United States Senate is a record that has been surpassed by but three Senators and equaled only by six. His former colleague from Maine, ex-Senator Hale, served for 30 years. They entered the Senate at practically the same time, and during their 30 years of service in that body through their joint efforts gave Maine influence in the Senate all out of proportions to our State's wealth and population.

Senator FRYE was a tireless worker and a debater without a peer, and Senator Hale, as Senator FRYE once stated in my presence, was the ablest legislator in the United States. Fortunate, indeed, was the State of Maine when she was served in the highest legislative branch of our Government by such men.

It can be said of Senator FRYE that he was as considerate of the opinions of others as he was strong in his own convictions. A determined but nevertheless a fair fighter, unsparing in his assaults in debate, but always courteous, firm in attitude yet gentle in his personal manner, as careful in his public acts as he was in his private affairs, he was true to his constituents and to his country. He was loyal to the former and patriotic for the latter. He was as diligent in the search of the facts of a case as he was gifted in presenting them with convincing logic and eloquence.

His personal interests throughout his long career were overshadowed by his sense of public duty, and his public service was preeminently conspicuous. Such was his life work; and as long as the history of the Nation is preserved on its pages will appear the written evidence of the unblemished record and the splendid character of WILLIAM PIERCE FRYE.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are undoubtedly others who would like to add a tribute, but are unavoidably absent, I move that a period of 20 days be allowed them in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

At this point Mr. GUERNSEY assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the sentiments and ideals which impress youth have a lasting influence throughout its future. That man is a benefactor among his fellows who appreciates and utilizes his own advantages for a useful and honored career; and, in addition, by example and by precept, awakens enthusiasm and devotion among the younger generation, which knew and believed in him.

One of the strongest and most cherished recollections of my boyhood was a political speech which I heard delivered by then Representative in Congress WILLIAM P. FRYE, at Rockland, Me., among his friends, in the political campaign of 1872, when he urged the reelection of President Grant, Gov. Chamberlain, and the Republican ticket. He was at that time some over 40 years of age, at the height of his manly vigor and attractiveness, with a voice and manner singularly winsome and forceful; and with a method and style for the treatment of his subject which appealed powerfully to his hearers. Of course, in those days the questions arising from the Civil War and reconstruction were uppermost, and always the theme of the political orator; and I remember so well, and to my youthful astonishment, that he discussed them with vigor and forcefulness, and yet with no bitterness or rancor toward the people or States of the South. The ordinary partisan orator of that period depended upon fanning the prejudices and creating apprehension among his hearers.

Mr. FRYE never descended to that, even though at the time to do so would easily win applause and approbation. Probably my youthful imagination was chiefly stirred by his peroration, in which he used the beautiful legend of St. Christopher to exemplify the mission of the Republican Party to preserve our Nation and its institutions. I was reared in the Republican faith, and so probably needed no particular monition to keep steadfast; and yet to this day there recurs to me the impression then made by his fervid and splendid oratory, his unexpected fairness and broadmindedness, his wealth of information and illustration, his clearness and good sense, and especially by his moral sincerity and lofty patriotism, with its call to us to stand by that party which had preserved our country and its blessed institutions. It is such a lesson as that, ground into one's fiber, which keeps us firm in the faith, and continuously striving to preserve and purify and strengthen the ideals and institutions of our Nation for ourselves and for the millions of our countrymen who will follow us.

This personal experience is only related to illustrate one of the great missions of the long and very useful life of Senator FRYE. He was one of the most potent and influential platform, political, and parliamentary orators of his time; surpassed by none in his attractiveness, in his popularity, and his capabilities. When I came to know him well I told him of the impressions caused by his speech, and he stated that probably up to the time he was talking to me he had made more political speeches and over a larger territory than any political speaker in the country. That was probably true at that date, but since then several of the leading political orators of both parties have surpassed his record.

His career in Congress, in both the House and Senate, was distinguished and extremely useful and patriotic. The same qualities which made him so charming and powerful upon the public platform were immensely more potential amid the exactions and in the complex and constantly increasing burdens of public service. As a parliamentarian he excelled, and the certainty, capability, precision, and eminent fairness of his guidance as a presiding officer made him one of the most sought and notable in the country.

The great subject which laid nearest to his heart was the development of the resources of his country and the advancement of its commerce and influence for the blessing of our own people. He served upon the most important committees of the House and Senate, and contributed to their work the vigor, industry, training, and splendid ability of a master in his own sphere. But through it all, in his practical, keen, incisive, but thoroughly upright way, he ever sought to advance the interests and welfare of his countrymen in the fields of commerce; since he believed that with increasingly prosperous conditions as a foundation there would surely follow in our citizenship the attributes which the highest character, culture, and civilization would bring to such a people in a land blessed like ours.

As a member of the peace commission to bring to a conclusion the Spanish War his services were extremely useful and in the broadest way. He foresaw the necessity for the United States to preserve and extend its influence throughout the world, not for trade and commerce merely, which should redound to the material advantage of our people, but he believed that the extension of our influence and institutions among the nations of the earth would have a reflex action for good among our own people in their daily rush for personal advantage, helping them to adequately appreciate what blessings they have, and compelling them to realize that in their own actions they should stand as exemplars before the peoples of the world, and that it always would be incumbent upon them to maintain and truly deserve their prestige.

The strength of his character which made his so sincere, so respected among his fellows, so influential among his countrymen, was a heritage from a New England ancestry which conferred upon him the best it had. It has been fortunate for our Nation that such as he and such qualities as his have been dedicated to the public service throughout our history. His aptitude for such duties was so well recognized, and his constituents had such entire confidence in and admiration for him, that opposition to his reelections became almost useless in his State.

The people of a great State can receive and deserve no higher encomium for their intelligence, their integrity, steadfastness, and patriotism than by their continued and hearty support of such a man as Senator FRYE for more than half a century of such public service. He earned and received and appreciated it, and the people reaped their full reward by the dedication of a rare life solely to their public work and to their public welfare. The peaceful and natural close of such a long, happy, useful, sweet, and honored life could not arouse the poignant sorrow except as one would sincerely mourn that such a departure is the divine dispensation and that such a friend has finally left us.

I do not know to whose memory could be more fittingly applied this tribute to a moral hero:

He never failed to march breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break;
Never thought though right were worsted
Wrong would triumph:
Held we fall to rise, are beaten to fight harder,
Sleep to wake.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, for more than half a century during the lifetime of Senator WILLIAM P. FRYE the people of his State honored him with their love and confidence by electing him to State and Federal offices. For more than 40 years in the two Houses of Congress he stood out in bold relief as a national figure, a leader in all that made for the welfare of his country and fellow man. It was not my privilege to know him intimately or to be classed among his personal friends, as he entered public life while I was but a boy in my teens. My first knowledge of this man, who was destined afterwards to ripen and develop into one of the most influential statesmen of his time, was while he was serving his State in the high office of attorney general. He was then in the full flush and vigor of his early manhood, strong, ardent, masterful in all those elements and qualities that go to make up a great lawyer, and one who by force of character and personal magnetism must inevitably become a leader among men. As an advocate at the bar, an orator and a public speaker, Senator FRYE had few equals anywhere. His services as a campaign speaker were eagerly and widely sought. His keen sense of wit, his eloquence and his perfect command of language were always a source of pleasure and satisfaction to those of his hearers who were in sympathy with his views, and the subtle sarcasm with which he could ridicule his opponents was a corresponding discomfort to them. His broad and liberal education, his vast and varied knowledge upon public questions, and his resourceful mind made him always a powerful friend and a dangerous opponent. That he held public office longer than any other man from his State is the strongest evidence of the regard and esteem in which his fellow citizens held him. He served the people of his home city, his State, and his country at large, the latter at home and abroad, and in all these places of public trust as the servant of his people he served with that degree of fidelity and distinction of which they were always justly proud. Senator FRYE was loved and respected by all those who knew him from the time he entered upon that long life of service and worth, until in the fullness of time he was called to take up the boatman's oar and cross the dark river to the great beyond, from which no traveler has ever yet returned, out into that life beyond the grave, into which no human eye has ever seen, into that life there of which no living man can ever know; and history will bear his name down through the generations that shall follow, and picture him as a vital and forceful part of the Nation during his time. Not the least, however, of importance was the example he gave to young men of this country, of one who by force of his own efforts and sterling character rose from the people and climbed step by step the ladder until he reached that goal, the zenith of the ambition of many and attained by few, a seat in the highest legislative body of the world—the Senate of the United States. His home was always on the banks of the river upon which he was born and where he died, and as the waters of that river flow out into the boundless ocean, so will the precepts and examples given by him flow out into the great sea of human toil and endeavor, and make the world better because he has lived. We all regret and mourn his loss as national in character, and pay this our humble but feeling tribute of respect to his memory.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE UTTER, OF RHODE ISLAND.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. O'SHAUNESSY, by unanimous consent,

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, death, the great reaper whose sickle never dulls and whose arm never falters, has reaped a rich harvest in the Sixty-second Congress. My colleague and friend, GEORGE HERBERT UTTER, was the eighteenth in its necrological roll. More have been added since his soul winged its way to that immortal home where all of earth's grandeur pales into insignificance in comparison with the riches our Heavenly Father has stored up for his faithful children.

Coming to Westerly, R. I., in 1861, from Plainfield, N. J., where he was born, July 24, 1834, he resided in that community continuously until his death, which took place on Sunday, November 3, 1912, two days prior to the general election. He had given freely of his splendid oratorical powers to the Republican national committee during the campaign and had stumped for his party in his usual effective fashion in the New England States, and, no doubt, by his unremitting endeavors hastened the end which was to be the climax of the malignant disease which gripped him. He was equipped for the masterful rôle he was to play in the business and political world at Alfred (N. Y.) Academy, in Westerly High School, and at Amherst College, from which he graduated in 1877. For years and until his death he was the publisher of the Westerly Sun, which steadily reflected the views of its owner, who was always ready with moral admonitions as applied to current events.

Congressman UTTER was a man of simple tastes and hardy virtues; in debate he manifested the spirit born of true conviction and in council gave abundant evidence of that indefinable something which generates and inspires confidence. He was a man of deep religious feeling, and his unfaltering devotion to the sect of which he was so conspicuous a member, the Seventh-day Baptists, found him ready for the summons which must come to all. No doubt perplexed him when, surrounded by his loving family at his home in Westerly, he passed away, comforted by the presence of devoted hearts and sustained by a State-wide approving sentiment of his private and public life. He was prepared for the fulfillment of the Savior's words, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." The sect to which he gave such rigorous devotion is small in numbers and makes Saturday its Sabbath Day. The sturdy observance of this habit alone marked him as an unusual man, as one who differed with millions, but differed conscientiously, manifesting at the same time a broad religious tolerance.

But there are deeds that should not pass away,
And names that must not wither.

His deeds, so characteristic of the man, shall not pass away, and his name shall be remembered wherever meritorious action and endeavor have left an impress upon the memory of man. It is related of him that, when governor of Rhode Island, he declined to attend a celebration in the city of Washington and delegated the lieutenant governor to take his place, because the exercises were to be held on Saturday. And in the performance of his duties in this great Chamber, only the most pressing necessity, the consideration of some very vital question, would cause his presence here on the day that he had dedicated as his Sabbath. He had the courage of his convictions, content with the approbation of his conscience. In political life he loved the truth, and dared speak it, even though in some cases it spelled defeat for some cherished ambition.

He had a distinguished and honorable public career. He was elected four times a member of the Rhode Island House of Representatives, and during one of those terms was speaker of the house. He was twice chosen as senator from his home town, and thereafter he filled, to the satisfaction of the public, the exalted posts of secretary of state, lieutenant governor, and governor of Rhode Island. And withal he remained the same genial, unassuming, charitably disposed Christian gentleman, magnanimous in his consideration of others, and never failing to find deep down in the other man's heart something to admire and approve. His oratorical ability, coupled with his unfailing, invaluable advice and meaty suggestion for high moral endeavor, made him a favorite at public gatherings, and I am sure that his cheering words will long be remembered by the many Bible classes, Young Men's Christian Associations, and commercial bodies that had the pleasure and satisfaction of hearing him. His was a conservative nature that held to old traditions and found little comfort in the new political dispensation. He had a reverent regard for American institutions, and a profound trust that, unchanged, they could and would work out a nation's destiny. With his tenacity of belief there was always coupled a bourgeoning hope that every political problem would be solved for the good of all the people, but his caution dispelled rash methods, and his nature quailed instinctively at quick transitions in the methods of government.

He brought an optimism to his work; his buoyant spirit was nowhere better shown than in his favorite poem:

"HOW DID YOU DIE?"

Did you tackle that trouble that came your way,
With a resolute heart and cheerful?
Or hide your face from the light of day
With a craven soul and fearful?
Oh, a trouble's a ton, or a trouble's an ounce,
Or a trouble is what you make it,
And it isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts,
But only how did you take it?

You are beaten to earth? Well, well, what's that?
Come up with a smiling face.
It's nothing against you to fall down flat,
But to lie there—that's disgrace.
The harder you're thrown, why the higher you bounce;
Be proud of your blackened eye.
It isn't the fact that you're licked that counts,
It's how did you fight—and why?

And though you be done to the death, what then?
If you battled the best you could,
If you played your part in the world of men,
Why, the critic will call you good.
Death comes with a crawl, or comes with a pounce,
And whether he's slow or spry,
It isn't the fact that you're dead that counts,
But only how did you die?

And here in this House, where his services were characterized by an unfailing sense of modesty and untiring zeal, we honor his memory. I can hardly reconcile myself to the knowledge that my cheerful and helpful colleague has passed away. How often he spoke to me in this Chamber in his kindly and fatherly way, little thinking that his useful, well-spent, highly moral life was so soon to end. He has gone, but he will live in the affections of a grieved domestic circle, in the respect of the State he loved and honored, in the memory of his services, and in the loving testimony of those whose good fortune it was to meet him here, to associate with him, and to work with him.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the Sixty-second Congress has been depleted by the hand of death to a greater extent than it has been my experience to witness since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives. Many of these deaths have been sudden and unexpected, and I am sure none more so than that of the late Member from the second district of Rhode Island, Hon. GEORGE H. UTTER.

His activities seemed to be at their height of usefulness when the second session of this Congress was concluded, and I am sure no one imagined when the parting good-bys were exchanged and we departed to our respective homes that we had parted forever in this life from our late associate. His program for active campaigning in the presidential contest in behalf of the party to which he owed allegiance, and from whose membership he had often been honored, seemed to promise fulfillment of the work which he enjoyed and his return to the scene of his activities and friendships here. But while man proposes and plans for the future there is an unerring destiny which overrules our purposes and shapes our ends.

Mr. UTTER was a resident of Westerly, R. I., from early boyhood, and was active in promoting the interests and shaping the public improvements of the town of his adoption. His natural ability was improved by education in the public schools and by academic and college training. He was a newspaper publisher, and as such and as a public-spirited citizen he had a marked influence among his fellow townsmen. He was an honored member of the Rhode Island House of Representatives for several terms and speaker of that body. He was also a member of the Rhode Island Senate, secretary of state, lieutenant governor, and governor of that State. Upon the death of the late Congressman Capron he was elected a Member of this body.

Mr. UTTER was a ready debater and an eloquent advocate of the policy of protection to American industries and American labor, under which the State of Rhode Island had marvelously grown and prospered until it became one of the most complete and varied industrial centers of growth and activity in New England. But not alone to political lines were his activities limited. He was frequently called upon to speak in different parts of the country in behalf of the extension of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association and also in addressing religious and other public assemblages. He was an eloquent and forceful speaker, and was always sure to have an appreciative audience whenever the announcement was made that he was to deliver an address. He was suddenly stricken with disease while actively engaged in the campaign for the Republican Party, and was compelled to submit to an operation, from which he did not recover.

I was assigned to membership of the committee which attended his funeral services at his home in Westerly, R. I. There was a large attendance at the exercises, of many persons prominent in public life from all over the State, and also his associates in Congress from Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. The places of business in Westerly were closed, and general evidence of respect to his memory were displayed by the citizens of the community, and thus the last tribute of respect and affection was paid to his memory on the day following the national election of 1912. The town, the State, and the Nation have been deprived of the services of a useful and worthy citizen and able legislator, but his words and his accomplishments will be recorded in the pages of history, and his example and worth may well be an inspiration to the generations who may contemplate his career in public and private life.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I enter these precincts to-day with laggard and hesitant steps. A funeral pall is over this Chamber, and shadowy forms, the ethereal essence of them whom we commemorate, walk by my side. A solemn hush is here where yesterday there was strenuous strife, and we who were partisans then are now one in that union of soul which awaits on common sorrow.

It was a brief acquaintance I had with the late Hon. GEORGE HERBERT UTTER, a little less than a year, but during that period it became close and intimate. During the political campaign of 1912 he spoke in Vermont, at my request, and in my own town, where he charmed all with his wit, his wisdom, his method, manner, and matter.

When we dwell upon his career we deal with a character which was excellent, rich, and rare; with a life that was clean, exalted, and noble; with garnered results which are worthy of study and emulation. There beat in his breast a heart large, warm, and true. He possessed a personality which attracted friends and held them. He loved and was beloved. He had faith in others and was himself trusted implicitly. For the greater part of his adult life he was a public servant, living in the limelight of official service, yet beyond reproach and without scandal. He was honest because it was right to be honest; he served to the best of his ability those who trusted him, because such service was their due. He lived a high-minded, whole-souled Christian gentleman and patriot, and at his death there is bereavement and lamentation.

In his life and in his death he verified the words of Scripture:

The highway of the upright is to depart from evil; he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul.

It is indeed most gratifying that at this hour we can recount the virtues of our dead with naught to extenuate, naught to conceal; that as a precious privilege we can name him as our friend, and in honoring him do honor to ourselves. When cut down he was in the full tide of honor and usefulness. "His death was untimely and his brethren mourn."

[Mr. REES addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, James A. Garfield once said:

There is no place on earth where a man will more certainly or more speedily reach his true level than in the House of Representatives.

GEORGE HERBERT UTTER illustrates the force of this observation. Elected to the Sixty-second Congress, he was permitted to serve only through two sessions—the extra session in 1911 and the regular session commencing December, 1911. Yet in this brief period he established himself in the esteem of his associates and left his impress on the legislation of this body. He laid the foundation for a career of usefulness and distinction. Genial and courteous in his manner, attentive to his duties, industrious in his work, bringing to his assistance a rare natural ability, supplemented by years of training and experience in the public service, he was admirably equipped to take a distinguished place in this high forum of national legislation.

There is an old Roman legend—

Let what each man thinks of the Republic be written on his brow.

There was written on the brow and displayed in the words and acts of GEORGE HERBERT UTTER a high conception of our Republic, an abiding faith in the fundamental principles on which our institutions rest, and a prophetic vision of its grander possibilities yet to come. While not omitting the details necessary to a legislator, he seemed to have a broad and comprehensive grasp of public questions. Emerson has said something about noting what "the hours are saying to the centuries." Ours is a great Nation, 48 separate sovereign States; 90,000,000 people; vast territory. It requires breadth of vision to grasp those great problems which involve the life and the future of our Republic. Frequently the human mind is so absorbed with the localized aspect of questions that it fails to reach out and encompass, so to speak, the national viewpoint. He had this faculty in a rare degree.

He had another character trait—intellectual courage. He did not fear to act on his judgment. He stood square shouldered to his duty as a public servant. He did not propound the interrogatory, "Is this measure policy?" He always appeared to be self-questioned by "Is this right?"

Small of stature, there was yet in his bearing the signet of command—command of himself and therefore command of others; which, united, forms leadership. Amid the storms and passions which frequently beset the pathway of public men he stood erect, unshaken as Atlas—

> While storms and tempests thunder on its brow,
> And oceans break their billows at its feet.

He was a firm believer in constitutional government. His love of constituted authority, reverence for the wisdom of our fathers, and deep convictions in fundamentals of our Government, together with an exalted patriotism and a lofty ambition for the destiny of our Nation, recalled to my mind the hope expressed by Lord Coke—

> Of living always under the protection of the law and in the gladsome light of jurisprudence.

Great memories are in themselves great leaders. The memory of those who have wrought for the Nation's good is in itself an education for those who follow. The memory of GEORGE HERBERT UTTER may well be preserved to the youth of our land, that they may emulate his example, that it may stimulate them to do their duty toward preserving the institutions he loved so well and to which his life was so nobly devoted.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, these are memorial exercises for one whom I never knew till I met him here as a Representative from Rhode Island, but whom I came to know with such respect and admiration that I felt a personal loss when he died. Mr. UTTER was a positive man, with real ideas about men and things, with courage and capacity to express those ideas. There was force in his manner and method of expression, but it was a charming kind of force that directed itself against policies and principles rather than against persons.

I do not remember any time when we were in active disagreement on any matter in debate, but I am sure that we could have differed frequently in that way without any present memory of bitterness that might have been caused by his remarks. The memory would not be here, because the bitterness never was there when Mr. UTTER spoke.

He spoke sometimes, but he wrote constantly, for he was the editor of a newspaper. I have reflected lately on the influence he must have exerted during his lifetime as an editor; not the kind of influence that might cause men to vote in a given way, at a given time, but the kind of influence, unknown to him and not realized by his reader, that shapes the mind and helps to form the thought that may be the cause of action long after the reading may have been forgotten.

I am sure that Mr. UTTER wrote editorials and articles of real value, because he said things of that sort. I remember well, for instance, a talk that he gave me one day when he stopped here at my seat on his way to the reference library in the rear of this section. It was a simple talk about present-day conditions of American life, in which Mr. UTTER developed to me his idea that most of the disturbance we noticed last spring was social in its nature rather than political. He showed me clearly that a large part of the price of present-day success is the loss of friendships and associations we truly enjoyed in earlier and humbler days. He proved from his experience and from mine that many men who used to be friends are not now friendly, and that the change in relations seemed to be because we had been singled out from our fellows for something of distinction.

I wish that I could set forth in this memorial the details of that talk, but I can not do so any more than I can ever erase from my mind and leave out of my life the effect of it. I am sure that Mr. UTTER wrote frequently in the columns of his newspaper just as he talked that day to me. I am also sure that those writings left a lasting impression on the minds of his readers, just as that talk left a lasting impression on me.

I remember well a newspaper editorial that I read many months ago written under the caption, "Creditors of humanity." It told something of the life story of a Massachusetts man who was secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission and had just died. It made the point that humanity keeps books with all who are given opportunity to serve. On one side of the ledger there is written down everything that comes to a man in the way of public position and office that presents opportunity; on the opposite side is a detailed statement of the things given back to humanity in return for these opportunities.

I know little, if anything, of the details of service rendered by Mr. UTTER before he came to Congress. I believe on what I know of him as a Representative here, however, that he was indeed of the few who are "creditors of humanity."

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, as editor of the Westerly Sun, as governor of Rhode Island, and Representative in Congress GEORGE HERBERT UTTER was a success. Under his direct management his newspaper had for a number of years been a power for good in Rhode Island, and its field of usefulness and influence was constantly growing. It is a clean newspaper in the fullest sense of that phrase, because its editorial direction and business management were clean, because Editor and Business Manager UTTER was a clean man. His newspaper reflected the high moral standard that he had set for his life work, and its tone was never lowered. As governor of the State of Rhode Island he conducted the affairs of that Commonwealth along the same lines as he did his private business. He inaugurated reforms in State affairs that had long been needed, but which required a high degree of moral courage, in view of certain powerful influences, to put into effect. That the measures were of much benefit to the State and the people thereof is evidenced by the fact that they are still effective, and there has been no desire, at least no ability, to change them. While he was a stanch Republican, he was not the sort of partisan who stood for everything his party did. He went with his party so long as he believed it to be right, at least in a moral sense, and when it ceased to be that he did not follow it.

In every position, either of private or public character, Gov. UTTER gave to the duties of the position the best advice that was in him, and invariably it was of a high order.

He was well fitted for congressional life. His newspaper training and his service for his State gave him a firm grasp on national affairs, and he was certain to become one of the most influential Members of his party in this body.

He was of a retiring nature, but that did not mean that he shirked responsibility or duty. He was always ready to stand in the front rank for what he considered right. He was a ready speaker as well as writer, and not only in political campaigns, but on the lecture platform, was he in much demand. He was a religious man and truly devoted to his faith. He had the fullest courage of his conviction, but was in no sense bigoted or narrow. He accorded to everyone the right to worship as he pleased, but had no patience with those who did not believe in any worship.

His home life was ideal, and there his loss is felt the keenest. Though of a serious turn of mind as distinct from the frivolous, yet he was no grouch. He felt that the man who scattered flowers in the pathway of the poor and unfortunate and let the sunshine of human happiness into the dark places of life was following in the footsteps of the Master. And so he lived and died, beloved of all who knew him and mourned the most by those who knew him best.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, my acquaintance with the late GEORGE H. UTTER was necessarily very brief, we both being at the time we first met new Members serving our first term, he representing a constituency of a State bordering on the Atlantic, I from a State touching the Pacific.

We were fellow members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and it was in attendance on committee meetings that my attention was first directed to him particularly. His desire for accurate information, his insistence on a plain understanding of all measures discussed in that committee, caused me to give more than ordinary thought to and created a desire for knowledge of the man, and, upon looking up his biography, I was not surprised to learn that he had been a member and speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Rhode Island, member of its State senate, secretary of state, lieutenant governor, and governor, respectively.

In noting his achievements and successful career, I was reminded of a little speech made by President Lincoln to a regiment of soldiers he was reviewing in front of the White House during the Civil War. President Lincoln said:

> I happen temporarily to occupy this big White House. I am a living witness that any one of your children may look to come here as my father's child has. It is in order that each one of you may have, through this free government which we have enjoyed, an open field and a fair chance that the struggle should be maintained that we may not lose our birthright.

As President Lincoln was a living witness to the opportunities opened up to the children of the most humble householder, so was Congressman UTTER a living example of the possibilities that are open to the laborer, the artisan, and the tradesman of our great country, if they only have the determination, the stamina, and ability to take advantage of the golden opportunities ever opening at their feet.

Congressman UTTER was a printer by trade, and a printer and publisher by occupation. He served his county and State in many capacities, each time establishing his worth. He was successively elevated in position and in opportunity to serve in greater things, and we can but mourn his sudden demise while yet in the perfection of his manhood and in the heyday of his success.

I feel that his life and achievements should be an inspiration to the youth of his own State and of our common country.

A kindly, courteous gentleman. Long shall we cherish his memory.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to have been closely associated with GEORGE HERBERT UTTER, late a Representative from the State of Rhode Island, in much of his congressional labors. We were members of the same committee and at times were brought into close contact by reason of work on subcommittees. His very unexpected death was to me a great personal loss, and to this service, in honor of his memory, I bring words of sorrow, feeble though they may be, yet too deep and real to measure by any standard other than of friendship for the man and a deep appreciation of the many virtues his life exemplified.

I shall leave to others the recital of the events of his life prior to the convening of the special session of the Sixty-second Congress, as my personal acquaintance with him began at that time.

A brief reading of his biography discloses the fact that his former work and training in public life had well fitted him for his duties as a Member of this body, and we see the result of that training reflected in his work.

In his committees and on the floor of this House he took an active part and interest. He thought for himself, and his judgment on public questions was formed only after mature deliberation and was always founded on a knowledge of the facts and reasoned out by a mind trained to measure men and apply principles.

As a Republican Gov. UTTER was loyal to his party and the theory of government for which it stands, yet higher than the good of party he ever placed the common welfare of the Nation, and only those measures which appealed to him as right and just received his support.

His services in this legislative body was brief, yet he impressed his individuality on all with whom he came in contact, and had it been given him to serve even for a few years his ability, his loyalty to duty, his zeal for the public good would undoubtedly have commanded general recognition, and his real worth would have given him a prominent place in the councils of this body.

Born in the year 1854, he was but a child when, in 1861, the War between the States began, and so he could not have a part in that great struggle which called to the field the young manhood of this Nation. When in 1898 the call to arms was again sounded he had reached that age in life when, until the Government was in greater need of men, he could not follow the flag to the front and participate in that brief but brilliant feat of arms. And so his fame is linked not to any martial epoch of our history, but is the product of an era of peace, yet his love and veneration for the men who bore arms in defense of our country was intense and sincere.

His fame rests not on titles, but his titles came to him by reason of the true greatness of the man.

In the closing days of a great political campaign, a campaign in which sane principles of self-government, by the people, were being assailed as never before, when all about him were the sounds of conflict, a conflict in which, from a sense of duty, he had enlisted with heart and soul on the side of law and order as he saw it, he must needs answer the higher call. His body, weakened by disease, refused longer to hold the life which struggled so hard to gain the victory.

This life is grand and good and noble, yet it is a battle, a struggle from the cradle to the grave.

The physical man, in order that he may feel and know the pleasurable sensations, must be subject to pain and decay; the soul of man, in order that it may soar to heights divine, has within it the possibilities of sinking into depths of low desire.

To war against pain and death, to struggle against that which would drag one to a lower level, physical, mental, and moral, is the challenge nature gives her children and impartially awaits our action.

The life of the departed shows him victor in this conflict. He had his days of sorrow and disappointment, but there was always the bright to-morrow—to-morrow with all its joys, its possibilities, and its pleasures. May we enter our to-morrow with a new realization that we are all agents of a great power in a mighty purpose; the manner of accomplishing that purpose we may not know, but if our work is good, if our lives are filled with good deeds, we shall have fulfilled the highest purpose of the Creator.

Gov. UTTER has reached the end of all human endeavor, and in that spirit land of life eternal has found what mortal man can never know—perfect happiness.

Peace to his soul, reverence for his memory, love for a life filled with good deeds—a life once ours, for evermore a part of the Infinite.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that unanimous consent be given to those who are unavoidably absent to extend their remarks and make them a part of the proceedings of this day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Senate concurrent resolution 2.

A concurrent resolution ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Whereas the Congress of the United States, after solemn and mature deliberation therein, has, by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, passed a concurrent resolution submitting to the legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, which resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That in lieu of the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of the same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution."

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Michigan (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the name and behalf of the people of this State, we do hereby ratify, approve, and assent to the said amendment.

Resolved further, That a copy of this assent and ratification, engrossed on parchment, be transmitted by his excellency the governor to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled and to the Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Marion County, S. C., praying for the enactment of the Kenyon-Sanders bill relative to the interstate shipment of alcoholic liquors in prohibition districts. I ask that the body of the petition be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, and that it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table and the body of the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, as follows:

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

We, the undersigned citizens of Marion County, State of South Carolina, do hereby respectfully petition you, as our Representative, to use your influence to the enactment of the Kenyon-Sanders bill, now pending, relative to the shipment of alcoholic liquors in prohibition districts. We feel that this bill, if passed, will be of untold benefit to those communities that have already voted prohibition for themselves.

We pray your earnest attention to this matter at once.

Signed by 84 citizens of Marion County, S. C.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a concurrent resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, praying that an appropriation of $100,000 be made for use in repairing the public roads on which rural free-delivery mail routes are established, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I present two petitions signed by citizens of Graham County, Ariz., earnestly petitioning in behalf of the early passage of the Kenyon-Sheppard bill. I ask that the petitions, including the names thereon, be printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks that the petitions, the nature of which he has stated, be printed in full in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the list of names is a very long list? We have heretofore, as a rule, not printed the names of petitioners, but the body of the petition itself.

Mr. ASHURST. There are about 45 or 50 names on each petition, and there are two petitions.

Mr. GALLINGER. As no one here would know those parties simply because their names are printed, would not the Senator be willing to have the petitions printed without the names?

Mr. ASHURST. No, sir; I regret that I would not be willing. I request that the names be printed, because they comprise some of the most honorable, the most respectable, and the most virtuous citizens of Arizona.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I feel constrained to object to the printing of the names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the names as well as the petitions be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that the body of the petitions and the names attached thereto be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I make this motion in order to accentuate that there are two rules in this body, one rule for one Senator and another rule for another Senator. Last week several petitions were presented and the names of the petitioners appeared in the RECORD. Surely if that was an improper proceeding the objection should have been made at that time as well as against the petitions which I now have the honor to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that the body of the two petitions, with the names attached thereto, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire what has been the custom in regard to these private petitions. I have received hundreds of them from the people of my State. I have filed them and I have never asked that the names be printed or the petitions except it was a memorial from the legislature.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. BRISTOW. If it is customary for such petitions to be printed in the RECORD, of course every Senator ought to have that privilege when the request is made. But if it is not customary then no one ought to have the privilege. The same rule ought to apply to all. I am anxious to know what the practice has been before I vote upon this question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would request Senators to turn to page 2768 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, February 8, 1913, and in the lower left-hand column they will observe that a petition was presented by the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] upon identically the same subject and practically in the same wording as the petitions which I now present, and the names appended to that petition are printed in the RECORD.

So, I say, if in good faith Senators desire to see that rule enforced, why do they not object to another Senator presenting petitions of an exactly similar character and having them printed in the RECORD with the names attached?

I shall always proceed upon the idea that every Senator here is the equal of every other Senator, and so long as I have the honor to represent in part the State of Arizona here I shall never consent that a rule shall be relaxed in favor of one Senator and then restricted as against another Senator.

I again ask Senators to look at the lower left-hand column of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2768, Saturday, February 8.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as is well known to the Senate, under an order adopted by the Senate as far back as the Forty-ninth Congress it was provided—

> That when petitions and memorials are ordered printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the order shall be deemed to apply to the body of the petition only, and the names attached to said petition or memorial shall not be printed unless specially ordered by the Senate.

I think the names are very rarely printed. In my experience I have very seldom known it to be done. It certainly can not be done except by unanimous consent. I doubt very much whether we can change a rule on motion. This is a rule, because it has been adopted by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the order which he read. It says that the names shall not be printed "unless specially ordered by the Senate," which would be by motion.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but no order of the Senate can be passed on the day on which it is offered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. LODGE. If an objection is made, it goes over under the rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. No objection has been made.

Mr. LODGE. I am making no objection; I am only calling attention to it. I say I am very sure all Senators here are aware that the practice in that respect has been very uniform and that names are very rarely printed, because if we opened the RECORD to the printing of names we should have columns and columns filled with nothing but names of petitioners. My own experience is that that rule has been very strictly enforced. When there are only a few names on a petition permission has been given to print them, but I think it is extremely exceptional.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that I should be very sorry that the Senator from Arizona should rest under an impression that there is any discrimination. I want to say to him that I have received, I think it is no exaggeration to say, 10,000 names affixed to petitions and memorials from my constituency, which I have never considered that I was at liberty to have printed in the RECORD. I would have loaded the RECORD so that it would be difficult to find anything in it except names. My understanding was that I was not at liberty to ask to have them printed.

I am quite sure that if it appears a petition was printed with the names it was rather through inadvertence or because the bulk of it was not sufficient to make it a matter of any particular consequence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the petition which was printed last Saturday was printed at my request. I had received many thousand names of a similar character, and many, many petitions of the same character. It was not my purpose to take part in the debate upon the subject, and I asked the consent of the Senate to print the petition, which was very short, and the short list of names attached to it, simply to occupy space enough in the RECORD to emphasize my interest in the subject. I suppose I have in my office a large drawer full of similar petitions, with the signatures attached, and I thought that that short list of names was not improper to go with the petition just as a sample of what I had received.

I certainly hope that the Senator from Arizona shall receive every privilege that I have received. I will gladly vote for his motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that in the request made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], in presenting the petition to which he referred, he did not ask that the names of the petitioners be printed in the RECORD, but simply requested that the petition lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

Such requests are made every day when the Senate is in session. If the Senator from Georgia had asked that the petition be printed, and also that the names of the petitioners be inserted in the RECORD, there is no question but that there would have been objection, because we have petitions here, as has been stated, with tens of thousands of names, and it has been the universal rule in the Senate that the names signed to such petitions be not printed. I have not the least objection to the names of petitioners being known, if it were necessary, but I want to say to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] that it would make his case no stronger to have the names printed; it would merely encumber the RECORD, and therefore I hope that he will not insist that the names be printed in the RECORD. I will call his attention to the fact that he may scan the RECORD for years and years back, and he will find very few cases where the names of petitioners have been so printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I made the objection, and in view of some observations on the part of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I wish to say that I am sure the Senator from Arizona will acquit me of any purpose of discrimination in matters of this kind.

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly have endeavored always to see that the Senator from Arizona should have his due in this body, that he should have proper recognition, and that his State should also have due and proper recognition. I have never during my term of service here asked that names attached to petitions be printed in the RECORD. I have had petitions with thousands of names signed to them sent to me, but, remembering the rule of the Senate, I have refrained from asking that they be printed in the RECORD.

I hope the Senator from Arizona will not feel that there is a purpose to discriminate against him individually or against his State in the objection I have raised. I think, after the Senator has been here a while, he will see the necessity for this rule and the propriety of it. While it has not, perhaps, heretofore been observed with absolute strictness in certain instances, such as that which occurred a few days ago when the request was not made to print the names but where they went into the RECORD, I trust that the Senator will not feel that that establishes a precedent which ought to be controlling.

I think, upon reflection, the Senator from Arizona will realize that his statement that these are the names of distinguished men in his State will carry just as much weight as though they were printed in the RECORD, and I hope that he will not insist on the motion that he has made, but that he will withdraw it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have very great respect for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He has been very kind to me since I have been here. I respect his judgment, his knowledge, his experience, and his motives in all matters, and I am satisfied that his motive in this instance is a good one and fair-minded; but I believe in this particular case we could well afford to waive the rule, if it be one, allow these names to be printed, and let some Senator who is chairman of the Committee on Rules or of the Commitee on Printing, or whoever might have jurisdiction, give notice that henceforth he would object to such requests, demand the enforcement of the rule, and treat all alike. I do not suppose there are above 75 or 100 of the names of these petitioners, and I do not suppose the cost to print them in the RECORD will be 5 cents. I am sure that Arizona is proud to be in the Union. She was trying to get in for a long time. I am sure that her citizens will take pride in letting others know that they are now citizens of the United States, and I am sure that we are all proud to have Arizona in the Union. Who is there here who is not proud to have her in the Union?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if my good friend from Montana will permit a word, he will remember that no Senator in the body commenced earlier to insist that Arizona ought to come into the Union than myself.

Mr. MYERS. I give the Senator from New Hampshire great credit for that and all due credit in other matters. I have great respect for the Senator, but I think——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I should like to finish.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

Mr. MYERS. I think we might well vote without objection, without delay, and without any disrespect to anybody, or to the rules, for that matter, to let these names be printed in the RECORD, and then if any Senator wants to invoke the inviolability of the rule hereafter on all alike, let it be known that it will be done; but as long as the names of petitioners from other States have been printed—and each State is supposed to be on an equal footing here—I believe in this one instance we might well permit these names to be printed. So I hope that the motion of the Senator from Arizona will prevail. I think it is nothing but fair and right and just.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona permit me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that this will not be construed as a precedent and that at least some of us in the future will have the privilege, without being called in question, to invoke the rule, I propose, so far as I am concerned, to withdraw objection to the printing of the names in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and before I resume my seat will say that no Senator can serve here long without cultivating a deep affection for him. So far as the State of Arizona is concerned, that State does not forget that when my colleague [Mr. SMITH], who is now an honored Senator upon this floor, was a Delegate in the House the Senator from New Hampshire was one of the Senators who always stood by the Territory, now the State, of Arizona. I am very grateful to the Senator for withdrawing his objection. I have not questioned, and must not be understood as questioning, his motives in objecting to the names of the signers of these petitions being printed in the RECORD. I withdraw, if I may, the demand for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the revocation of the order for the yeas and nays?

Mr. ASHURST. I do, Mr. President.

Mr. CLAPP. Before that is disposed of, Mr. President, I should like to say a word. I do not know that it will do any good, but I wish to state that some years ago the Senate adopted a rule whereby petitions, pension bills, claims bills, and private bills of all kinds should be filed with the Secretary to appear in the RECORD as introduced by the Senators presenting them, so as to avoid unnecessary delay of the Senate in the morning hour and taking the time of the Senate in presenting such matters. It seems to me that that rule ought to be observed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent for the revocation of the order for the yeas and nays. Without objection, it will be so ordered, and the petitions, together with the signatures, will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The petitions are as follows:

To the UNITED STATES SENATE,

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 6062) for the preparation of a plan for the erection of a foundation and pedestal on ground belonging to the United States Government, in the city of Washington, upon which to place a memorial or statue, to be furnished by the State of Pennsylvania, of Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1202) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (S. 8414) to authorize aids to navigation and other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6083) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1203) thereon.

THE FRANCIS GIRARD GRANT.

Mr. THORNTON. From the Committee on Private Land Claims I report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 11478) to quiet title and possession with respect to a certain unconfirmed and located private land claim in Baldwin County, Ala., in so far as the records of the General Land Office show said claim to be free from conflict, and I submit a report (No. 1201) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. This is a local measure which has been passed by the House, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from what committee the bill was reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I dislike very much to object to the consideration of this or any other bill, but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has given notice that he will address the Senate this morning on the Kenyon interstate liquor bill, which must be voted upon not later than 6 o'clock. A number of Senators desire to be heard upon that bill, and the time is barely sufficient.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It will take only a few moments to pass this local bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know; it may take a good many moments. I have seen some of these matters that we were promised would take only a few moments take a long time. I therefore feel constrained to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

F. E. WARREN,
GEO. PEABODY WETMORE,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. T. JOHNSON,
A. S. BURLESON,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, regarding the conference report, which has just been read, I ought to say to the Senate that it is only a partial agreement. There are numerous matters undecided, such as the Senate amendments concerning assay offices, surveyor general's offices, Indian matters, certain employees of the Senate, the police force of the Senate and House, and some other minor matters.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the Commerce Court.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and the Commerce Court. Unless there is some other disposition proposed, I shall move that the Senate insist upon its amendments in disagreement and ask for a further conference with the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if it is his desire that the Senate shall now take action upon the report as presented?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I have no doubt that this form of conference report is one that has been established and followed for a long time, but I must say that it is unsatisfactory to a Senator when a conference report comes in, to find the only reference made is that the conferees have agreed on amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and so forth; have not agreed on amendments numbered 16, 17, 18, and 19; and have agreed on amendments numbered 23, 24, 25 and 26 with certain amendments. I am not criticizing the committee in this particular instance, but I am very much interested in this conference report, vitally interested in some portions of it, and I want to keep in touch with it. I want to know what the stage of the proceeding is, so that I can be on guard. I do not like to have a conference report adopted here as to amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and then skipping over amendments 12, 13, 14, and 15, and confirming amendments numbered 25, 26, and 29. I do not believe the average Member of the Senate, when he votes to confirm that kind of a report, knows very much about what he is doing.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we are proceeding in the course that has been followed for a great many years—more than a score of years. I do not consider that any report is finally and fully settled until the last item is settled, but it is sometimes of great assistance to the managers of the conference to have their work checked up so far as they have agreed and then endeavor to obtain agreements as to items left in disagreement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I simply desire to give notice now that the attempt to close offices and interfere with necessary public business carried on for the public welfare in points throughout the West is not going to be confirmed here in the form of a conference report without a few remarks from one of the Senators from South Dakota, and they may take some time. I do not want a conference report perpetrating that kind of an injury to all of the northwest section of this country to be confirmed here as an agreement or disagreement to amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and so forth.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague, the chairman of the committee, whether it has been the custom of the Senate to print partial reports, so that Senators may be advised as to what items have been disposed of in conference?

Mr. WARREN. The report as read will go into the RECORD, so that on to-morrow morning it will be before every Senator, and, in connection with it, he can consult the bill itself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can we secure a copy of the bill with the amendments numbered, so that we may be able to understand exactly what has been agreed to?

Mr. WARREN. They can be furnished to the Senators from the desk.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Wyoming consent to let the matter go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. WARREN. I am not holding it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought the Senator had moved to agree to the conference report.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Utah that if the report should be agreed to so far as it goes I should then ask that the Senate insist upon its amendments still in disagreement and ask for a further conference; but we have not yet arrived at that stage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But not to assent to the agreements already made?

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, that is a question for the Senate to decide. I think we are making more of a point on this matter, probably, than is necessary. The bill can not become a law until it is completed; and the acceptance of the report, so far as it goes, is simply one of the parliamentary stages.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Some of us are very much interested in the report which has been made, and desire to be heard upon it. We have a special order assigned for to-day on a very important bill that ought to be discussed, and the time which is allowed for discussion on that measure is not sufficient. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Wyoming will permit this matter to go over until to-morrow morning, when we shall have time to discuss it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do, if I have the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say to the Senator that I think he is proceeding under a slight misapprehension as to the effect of agreeing to this report. Partial agreements of conferees do not bind. If we disagree to their report, we can not amend it; we disagree to the whole report, and it goes back to conference, where the whole subject is open. Even if the conferees have agreed on everything but one item, they may come back on that item in order to get the instruction of the Houses. I do not understand that the partial agreements which we have been in the habit of presenting here in the least prevent their being discussed when the final report is made.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No, Mr. President; that is not the point. The point is whether or not by agreeing to this partial report we do not give the conferees to understand that, so far as that part of the report is concerned, they have the consent of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Though technically it does not bind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know; but in reality it does.

Mr. LODGE. In that sense it undoubtedly gives the conferees the right to say that the Senate favors those items, and that has been the practice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, that is the thing to which I object. I think Senators should be heard upon these matters before the conferees have any understanding on the subject.

Mr. LODGE. They will be just as open after the final report as they are now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have not counted the amendments in this bill. Last year in the similar bill there were something over 500 of them. They are largely matters of a clerk more or less here and there, or one or two or three hundred dollars more or less here and there as to salary, and are hardly matters that the Senate in Committee of the Whole would care to take up.

If the Senator will permit me, I will state exactly what is still in disagreement. I think it ought to go into the RECORD, so that if it comes up to-morrow or at any other time we will know more about it.

Beginning at the opening of the bill, the first disagreement is upon inserting the name of Woodbury Pulsifer as one of the employees.

The second matter is that of increased pay for two employees, Loeffler and Keller.

The third is that of the Capitol police force, which the House has seen fit to cut in two. It allows only one-half of the force that is now employed under the joint management of the Sergeants at Arms of the House and of the Senate.

The next matter is that of the insertion of the name of George H. Carter, the printing clerk. Objection is made to naming him.

The next is the payment of $300 to a lady, Miss Etta J. Giffin.

The next matter is that of the employment of an $1,800 clerk that we proposed, in addition to what the House proposed, in the copyright office of the Library of Congress.

The next item is the freight on bullion and coin, for which the House allowed only $15,000 instead of $75,000 or $100,000 as formerly, and which the Senate increased to $40,000.

The next matter is the number of internal-revenue collection districts, which we reduced by four last year. Such a reduction has not seemed to be satisfactory, and we seek to put them back to the former number. That is in disagreement.

Then there is the entire list of mints and assay offices, which the House cut out, taking out all of the assay offices but one in the Northwest. Those are still in disagreement.

Then there is the matter of $5,000 for the National Aerodynamical Laboratory Commission.

There is a disagreement of about $18,000 in regard to clerks for the Indian office, which the Senate seeks to provide for the examination of titles and distribution of amounts due to the heirs of deceased Indians. It is part of the Indian service which the department says is necessary.

The next is the small matter of two or three employees in the Patent Office.

Then comes the matter of surveyors general and their clerks. The House has sought to do away with one of the offices of the surveyors general, and to cut down very largely from the estimates for all the others. The Senate has put in, in most cases, the amount estimated for, but has never exceeded the amount called for by the estimates, and has put back the one office which the department states is as necessary as any surveyor general's office in the United States—the one which is for South Dakota and Nebraska jointly.

Then comes the matter of the Commerce Court. I think it is generally conceded that the Commerce Court must be provided for until the end of the fiscal year. I think it is more a question of whether it shall be taken care of in this bill or in a deficiency bill. But since it was estimated for in this bill, and has been provided for, we introduced it here and the Senate indorsed it. So the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate have felt that they should maintain it.

Those are the items in disagreement, and all the items.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator has given the items which are in disagreement; but what are the items that we are agreeing to? That is what I am interested in. I am not so much interested in what the conferees have not yet agreed upon as what we are now ratifying.

Mr. WARREN. I hardly think the Senator would want me to go into those generally, because there are perhaps a couple of hundred of them. The bill itself will show the Senator what they are.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why should it not be printed, and then go over, and be taken up to-morrow morning?

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection whatever to that course.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let us have it printed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, since there seems to be a general wish that the report should be printed, and that we should proceed no further upon it at the present time, I shall not make the motion which I indicated I desired to make, for a further conference, but shall let the matter go over and take it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does it follow as a matter of course, then, that it will be printed?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has just announced that it will be printed.

DEPOSIT OF PUBLIC MONEYS IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 462), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching his authority to make the order for the disposition, custody, and disbursement of the public moneys embodied in Department Circular No. 5, issued by said Secretary of the Treasury on January 9, 1913. Also to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching the effect of said order upon the system and mode of receiving, caring for, handling, and disbursing said public moneys in effect prior to the issuance of said order, and especially what change in said system was effected by said order; also any information in his possession as to the manner and in what proportion the public moneys specified in said order are distributed among the several national banks therein referred to, and to designate what, if any, additional banks have been designated as Government depositories on account of the change in the custody of the public moneys specified in said order, and where the same are located; also the amount of daily receipts of the Government which have been deposited in banks since said order went into effect, and what, if any, security therefor or interest thereon has been required by said Secretary of the Treasury from the said banks, and what amount or proportion of said daily receipts has been deposited in banks in New York City; also to state the monthly average amount of all funds in the custody of disbursing officers which said order requires to be deposited in banks, but which prior thereto were deposited with the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States; also what is the average monthly amount of United States disbursing officers' accounts in New York City.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to make a brief statement in regard to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The statement of the United States Treasury at the close of business February 7, 1913, shows that the customs receipts of the United States for that day amounted to $1,076,175. This order, designated as circular No. 5, changes the mode of caring and keeping and the place of deposit of these daily receipts and will change the place of deposit of public moneys during the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1913, according to the report of the Treasury, to the amount of $201,551,299.

This order was made without any legislation authorizing or directing it. From statements in the public press I have noticed that the Secretary of the Treasury claims that it is authorized by law. It is my judgment that it was not authorized by law. There has been no change in the law in that regard for a great many years. If it is authorized by law, and if the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, can control and direct the place of deposit, as between the Public Treasury or subtreasury of the United States and a private bank, of public moneys amounting to over $200,000,000 a year, the law ought to be changed; and the Senate ought to have full information from the Secretary of the Treasury as to his motives and purposes in making such an order.

On the other hand, if the law does not authorize this order, which has created a great deal of comment throughout the country and more or less astonishment, then it is perfectly obvious that it is a matter of the most serious import, and one upon which the Senate should be immediately informed and which undoubtedly would call for some action of a pronounced character by Congress.

I will detain the Senate for only a few moments. The order in substance is contained in the first paragraph of the so-called circular No. 5, which is as follows:

For the purpose of bringing the ordinary fiscal transactions of the Federal Government more nearly into harmony with present business practices, it has been determined that the daily receipts of the Government shall be placed with the national-bank depositaries to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Disbursements will be made by warrant or check drawn on the Treasurer, but payable by national-bank depositaries, as well as by the Treasury and subtreasuries, in accordance with the following regulations.

It proceeds to set out certain regulations as to accounts, the manner of issuing checks and warrants by which these moneys shall be disbursed.

Mr. President, the statutes of the United States expressly require that the customs receipts shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States or with a subtreasurer. The statute also requires that moneys intrusted to the disbursing officers shall be kept with the Treasurer of the United States or in a subtreasury, or, in places where there is no subtreasury, may be deposited in a national bank depositary.

So far as I am informed, and I think that I am informed upon the subject, there is no subsequent statute which has changed the law which I have just stated and which has been in effect for almost a hundred years.

The National City Bank, of New York City, issued a circular dated February, 1913, commenting upon this order of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was prepared no doubt by a financial expert connected with the National City Bank, which is one of the Standard Oil banks. This circular, which has been published throughout the country, says:

When the Treasury Department was established 124 years ago it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to superintend the collection of the revenues. Nearly 60 years later it was made a felony for any officer of the United States to deposit in any bank any portion of the public moneys intrusted to him. This drastic legislation, which had as its foundation the unfortunate experience of the Government with the banking business, was partially repealed by the national currency act and the national bank acts of 1863 and 1864, by permitting internal-revenue receipts to be deposited in banks. It was not until 1907 that Congress permitted customs receipts to be so deposited. One of the important features of Secretary MacVeagh's plan now is to take advantage of this act.

I think that a search of the banking and currency act of 1907 will fail to disclose that there is a word or syllable in it which amends or repeals the laws existing prior to that time as to the deposit of public moneys in the hands of the disbursing officers or as to the deposits of money received from customs.

It is evident that some contention is made by the Secretary of the Treasury that the law of 1907 authorized this change. I want briefly to call attention to the manner and the form in which the order is made and in which the business is transacted for the purpose of showing that the Secretary of the Treasury knows that the law is still in force which requires these funds to be deposited in the Treasury or a subtreasury, and that it is simply a sham system of keeping accounts by which under the name of keeping accounts with the Treasurer of the United States in fact the accounts are kept with private banks. There is one peculiar statement contained in the circular of the National City Bank which I have just read. I will read some of the preceding sentences:

The method of making disbursements which has just been adopted also marks the passing of the old order as to expenditures.

There are two separate and distinct propositions involved in this circular. One of them is as to the place of deposit of the customs receipts; the other, a distinct matter, is the place of deposit of the funds intrusted to and under the custody of the disbursing officers:

For nearly 50 years the Treasury Department has been operating under a statute requiring disbursing officers to keep their accounts with the Treasurer of the United States, an assistant treasurer, and in places where there is no treasurer or assistant treasurer with a national-bank depository. This has been strictly construed to prevent a disbursing officer from having an account with a national-bank depository in a city where there is a subtreasury.

This is the interesting statement, in connection with the preceding, contained in the circular issued by the National City Bank:

It is interesting to note—

The circular says—

that the change which has been made is sustained by the same section of law which was supposed to prohibit just what is now being done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? Some little time ago I objected to the consideration of a bill presented by the Senator from Alabama upon the ground which I then stated. I did not know that the resolution which the Senator has proposed would lead to debate or I should have asked that it go over under the rule.

I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that at 6 o'clock to-day we are obliged to vote upon the pending measure, and there have been notices given already that Senators would address the Senate upon that matter. Unless it can be taken up within a reasonable time some of those who desire to be heard will be denied the privilege. I hope under those circumstances the Senator will permit the resolution to lie over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not anticipate—I trust, at least—that there will not be any objection to the resolution. The statement which I wish to make is very brief. I would have concluded it in five minutes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In order to be consistent with the Senator from Alabama, I am obliged to ask that the resolution shall lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, it necessarily does so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I give notice, then, that I shall call it up to-morrow, and complete my remarks at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to give notice that on Saturday, March 1, 1913, I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions commemorative of the life and character of Hon. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH, late a Member of the House from California.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELBERT H. HUBBARD.

Mr. CUMMINS. I give notice that on Saturday, March 1, 1913, I shall call up the resolutions commemorative of the life and character of Hon. ELBERT H. HUBBARD, late a Member of the House from Iowa.

BUREAU OF NATIONAL PARKS.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to give notice that I will address the Senate on Thursday, the 13th, after the routine morning business, upon the bill (S. 3463) to establish a bureau of national parks, and for other purposes.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that House bill 17593 be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 17593) to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate commerce character in certain cases was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this bill is very similar in its nature to the so-called Kenyon bill, and I venture to ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah objects.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be referred to the committee, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: When House bill 17593 was laid before the Senate I suggested that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask unanimous consent that the action of the Senate be rescinded and that the bill be allowed to lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill indicated by him, which was previously referred to the Judiciary Committee, may now lie on the table. Is there objection? It will be so ordered, without objection.

REGULATION OF PLACES OF AMUSEMENTS—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 1066).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without approval, Senate bill 2600, entitled "An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to prevent the exhibition of obscene, lewd, indecent, or vulgar pictures in public places of amusement in the District of Columbia."

Upon inquiry I find that the requirement of section 2, that all picture films shall be submited to the District Commissioners for investigation and approval before exhibition, is, under present conditions, not only unnecessary but incapable of enforcement without unduly encroaching upon the services of the police force of the District. In this connection I wish to call your attention to the accompanying letter to the Attorney General on the subject from the District Commissioners, dated February 3, 1913.

I beg to suggest that the purpose of this bill may be accomplished by a statute merely prohibiting, under a penalty, the exhibition of objectionable pictures, without the requirement of prior investigation and approval by the commissioners before exhibition, and to recommend the passage of such a measure.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 10, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that bill which the President has vetoed was introduced and earnestly favored by me, and it passed both Houses of Congress. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia gave their approval of the bill. It seems to me that the suggestion of the Attorney General is not a wise one, and yet it is proper that the committee should give it consideration.

I regret that the bill has been vetoed, inasmuch as I believe the proposed law would have done much toward protecting the youth of Washington from witnessing pictures that are certainly not calculated to improve their morals or to contribute to their education along sound lines. No instrumentality can be imagined that is better calculated to corrupt the morals of the young than indecent pictures, and the bill was intended to protect them from that danger.

I move that the veto message and the accompanying bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I had intended at this time to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3130) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Conrad-Stanford Co. to use certain lands, but I understand——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. MYERS. I have not asked for the consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, I beg pardon.

Mr. MYERS. I said I had intended to ask it, but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] stated awhile ago that a number of Senators desire to speak immediately after the close of the morning business on the Kenyon bill. I had observed that it was set down to be taken up at 3 o'clock, but I am told that there are a number of Senators who desire to speak on it before that time. I have no wish whatever to interfere with the desire of any Senator to address the Senate on that or any other subject, but I ask at this time unanimous consent that an order be made that Senate bill 3130 be taken up for consideration immediately after the final disposition of Senate bill 8033, the Connecticut River dam bill, which comes up to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply desire to state to the Senator from Montana that there are so many unanimous-consent agreements now given we can hardly tell where they are going to lend; that there is not a single appropriation bill which has passed both Houses and been agreed upon by the conferees; and I certainly shall object at present to any unanimous-consent agreement for consideration of a bill, unless it is provided it shall not interfere with appropriation bills and conference reports.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will add that qualification to my request, providing that it shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills or conference reports.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or a previous unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. And I should like——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For the present I object to the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MYERS. I have been trying for a long time to get up this bill. It is manifest that I can not get it up in any other way. It is on the calendar, but whenever it is called on the calendar for objected bills there is objection made, which is all right. It is the privilege of any Senator to object, of course. The calendar is never called so that the bill can be reached on its own right, and I know of no other way of getting the bill before the Senate.

Therefore I move that, notwithstanding the objection, an order be made now that the bill be taken up for consideration immediately after the final disposition of Senate bill 8033, providing that it shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills or conference reports.

Mr. SMOOT. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that it would require a two-thirds vote. The Senate can make a special order at any time, but a special order requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MYERS. It requires only a majority vote to consider it, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But to make a special order requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MYERS. The bill was introduced nearly two years ago, in the summer of 1911, and I am about despairing of ever getting it to a vote. I will withdraw the motion.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I had expected to submit some remarks in favor of the Kenyon-Sheppard bill, but on account of an important committee meeting on an appropriation bill it will be impossible for me to remain during the discussion and to submit remarks. I therefore ask unanimous consent to print the following excerpts from the Central Christian Advocate, which give strong reasons for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the matter indicated by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Excerpts from the Central Christian Advocate, published at Kansas City, Mo., Claudius B. Spencer, D. D., editor, December 25, 1912.]

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

To the people of Kansas:

"For your altars and your firesides." It has ever been the sentiment of humanity that the most sacred treasures are the altars and firesides of the people. This it is which has written the most sublime chapters of history. For their altars and firesides men have willingly shed their blood. The sentiment is the fountain of patriotism; it is the basis of laws. To stand by and see their altars and firesides jeopardized is an act unworthy of real men.

Citizens of Kansas, the interstate-commerce laws shield men—of that grade of character capable of doing it—in shipping into your borders intoxicating liquors which is prohibited, under the most severe penalties, by your laws. This Federal shelter you feel to be not only a nullification of yours laws, but also an attack upon your firesides and altars. And, citizens of Kansas, you believe the Kenyon-Sheppard bill, Senate No. 4043, will give you relief from such Federal protection of men who in your own State are branded as criminals and punished by sentence to State prison.

NULLIFYING THE STATE LAWS.

We call your attention, citizens of Kansas, to the action taken by the Southern Sociological Congress, held a little time ago in Nashville, Tenn. The question of this nullification of State laws relating to the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors was under consideration. The following action was taken without a dissenting voice:

"Throughout the Southern States determined opposition to this traffic has resulted in the enactment of laws by which five entire States and approximately 90 per cent of the territory of the remaining States of our southland now forbid the sale of intoxicating liquors.

"Under the present Federal law the States are powerless to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors from other States, even when consigned to notorious violators of law and for the avowed purpose of sale contrary to the laws of the State. Under our system of government a citizen of one State should not be given privileges and opportunities under the protection of interstate commerce which the people have wisely denied to their own citizenship within the State.

"Therefore, in view of all these things, be it

"Resolved, That it is unjust to States having prohibited the liquor traffic, in whole or in part, for the Federal Government to permit people in other States to ship these States alcoholic liquors intended to be used in violation of their laws; and we call upon Congress to pass promptly the Kenyon-Sheppard-Webb-McCumber bill, which will permit the States to enforce their own laws by preventing the introduction of liquors from other States into their territory for unlawful purposes.

"We insist that the present situation is both anomalous and intolerable. The fact that outside and irresponsible citizens of other States should, under the guise and protection of interstate commerce, have the power to furnish the bootlegger and the blind tiger with their supplies of liquors by means of which they carry on their unlawful traffic is repugnant to every sentiment of justice and of fair dealing between the Federal Government, under its delegated commercial power, and the States, under their inherent powers of police. We insist that no political issue transcends this in importance, going directly, as it does, to that relationship of equality and comity which should be established and maintained between them under our dual system of government."

The Southern Sociological Congress then unanimously passed this resolution:

"We therefore urge Senators and Representatives in Congress to support, both with their influence and votes, the pending bill above named and vigorously to oppose the efforts of the liquor interests of the country to delay and defeat it."

ANALYSIS OF KENYON-SHEPPARD BILL.

Citizens of Kansas, lest it may have escaped you, we beg to ask you. What is this Kenyon-Sheppard bill, S. 4043? Stripped of its verbiage, to use the summary of Senator SANDERS of Tennessee, it is:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment of intoxicating liquors from one State into any other State by any person to be received or used in violation of any law of such State, is hereby prohibited."

The bill is not a prohibition bill. We might wish it were; but it is not. It does not prevent a man from drinking intoxicating liquor. It has no penalties. It simply lifts the shelter which the Federal Government has placed around men of such character as to ship to men in prohibition States intoxicating liquors to be sold contrary to and in defiance of State laws.

Precisely what the bill is intended to stop is set forth in this circular sent into Idaho, a dry State, by a liquor firm in Salt Lake City. In his speech in the Senate, December 17, Senator KENYON, author of the bill, held aloft the circular; it was illuminated with pictures of Uncle

Sam, some ten in number, in various poses, and at the top was this announcement, "Uncle Sam our partner." The circular was then read by Senator KENYON. We reproduce the circular:

"UNCLE SAM IS OUR PARTNER.

"THE FRED J. KIESEL CO., OGDEN, UTAH.
"Mail Order Liquor Department.

"To meet the surprisingly increasing demand from dry Idaho counties and other dry sections we have increased our bottled in bond and blended whisky stock and are ready to supply all demands from the thirsty, be they bankers, merchants, tradesmen, laborers, ministers, bootleggers, or even politicians, from the governor down to the least official.

"Our list includes the following well-known brands: Sunny Brook, Old Crow, Old Kissel, Hermitage, Our Joe, Guckenheimer, Paul Jones, and Chicken Cock.

"Pabst Blue Ribbon, 'the Beer of Quality.' Idan-ha, the monarch of table and medicinal waters; also finest of wines and brandies from our own winery at Sacramento, Cal.

"Price lists furnished on application. Address all communications to the Fred J. Kiesel Co., Mail Order Department, Ogden, Utah."

This circular exactly sets forth what "partnership" it is the Kenyon-Sheppard bill is intended to dissolve.

CONDITIONS DEMANDING THE KENYON-SHEPPARD BILL.

We wish to leave no stone unturned to show the people of the West that this statement of the Salt Lake defiers of the Idaho laws is correct. We may be permitted to quote from some remarks of the senior Senator from Georgia upon this subject:

"Briefly stated, the conditions which demand the passage of this or some similar bill are these: Every State in which the traffic in liquors has been prohibited by law is deluged with whisky sent in by people from other States under the shelter of the interstate-commerce law. There are daily trainloads of liquors in bottles, jugs, and other packages sent into the State consigned to persons, real and fictitious, and every railway station and every express company office in the State are converted into the most extensive and active whisky shops, from which whisky is openly distributed in great quantities. Liquor dealers in other States secure the names of all persons in a community, and through the mails flood them with advertisements of whisky, with the most liberal and attractive propositions for the sale and shipment of the same. Freed from the expense of the middleman, the distiller or dealer in other States is enabled to sell to the individual in the prohibition State at a less price than the purchaser formerly paid to the domestic whisky dealer. It is evident that under such circumstances the prohibition law of a State is practically nullified, and intoxicating liquors are imposed upon its people against the will of the majority."

CHARACTER OF COMMODITY AIMED AT.

There is another phase: What is the character of the business such States as Kansas, Oklahoma, North Dakota, Tennessee have driven from the ranks of respectable and permissible occupations? We will make no appeal to sentiment. We will accept the definitions made by the Supreme Court of the United States, a tribunal incapable of being swerved by rhetoric or sentimentality—the Supreme Court of the United States, in a number of cases, with reference to this. In the case of Welsh v. State (126 Ind., 72) the court says that—

"The license law treats the traffic as dangerous, as dangerous to public and private morals, and as dangerous to the public peace and the good order of society."

In The State v. Gerhardt (145 Ind., 439) the court says:

"The unrestricted traffic in intoxicating liquors has been found by sad experience to be fraught with great evil and to result in the most demoralizing influence upon private morals and the peace and safety of the public."

In Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 623, 685–662) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"It is not necessary for the sake of justifying the State legislation now under consideration to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism, and crime which have their origin in the use or abuse of ardent spirits. * * * For we can not shut out of view the fact within the knowledge of all that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks; nor the fact established by statistics acceptable to everyone that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are in some degree at least traceable to this evil."

Again, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Crowley v. Christensen (137 U. S., 86), says:

"By the general concurrence of opinion of every civilized and Christian community there are few sources of crime and misery to society equal to the dramshop, where intoxicating liquors in small quantities, to be drunk at the time, are sold. Every State shows a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source."

This is the business which the States of Kansas and Oklahoma and others have had the moral courage to rise up and abolish. It is abhorred by the people. To engage in it is punishable by sentence to State's prison and the striped clothes of a convict. And this is the business which is defiantly carried on under the protection of Federal decisions as to interstate commerce, the only requisite being that a man shall ship his goods from a point outside of the State, he then being free to laugh at the State laws, which would send him to State's prison, to scorn, seeing "Uncle Sam is his partner," by such protection. The Kenyon-Sheppard bill deprives the shipper of that impenetrable partnership.

THE LIQUOR PEOPLE AND THE BILL.

How the liquor people regard this bill may be seen from the following:

[From Bonforts Wine and Spirit Circular, Nov. 25, 1912.]

"Congress convenes December 2. On December 16 the Kenyon bill (S. 4043) will be made the special order of business. This bill is the most dangerous measure ever aimed at the liquor traffic. What have you done to defeat it? Your Senator and your Congressman are your representatives and must listen to your protest. This bill must be killed. It will not die unless Senators and Congressmen are made aware of the strong opposition to it. You can do a great deal to help defeat this bill. The passage of the Kenyon bill will be the biggest victory ever won by the Anti-Saloon League. What are you going to do about it?"

[Circular being sent out to liquor dealers by David Wise & Co., distillers and wholesale liquor dealers of Chicago.]

"EXTREMELY IMPORTANT.

"On December 16 next there will come up in the United States Senate at Washington, D. C., a bill known as the 'amended Kenyon bill,' No. 4043. This bill would take liquors out of interstate commerce. This means that you could not have whisky, wines, beer, or other liquor shipped to you, either by freight or express, if you live in a territory where the sale of liquor is forbidden.

"Please act quickly. Get as many well-known and prominent citizens as you can to write to your United States Senators, protesting against the passage of this bill. Letters of protest should go to Washington between December 1 and 12."

KANSAS CITY AND ST. LOUIS OPPONENTS OF THE BILL.

And now, citizens of Kansas, and, for that matter, of Oklahoma, all this is written to awaken you to the necessity of immediately petitioning the Senate to liberate you from the coils of the python which this "partnership" has fastened about you. And why?

You would think, citizens of Kansas and Oklahoma, that the Senate would be more than ready to give you this relief. It is your altars and firesides that are at stake. President-elect Woodrow Wilson, April 2, 1912, in vetoing a bill passed by the New Jersey Legislature, spoke concerning the attitude of the Federal Government on this question. He said: "It is a mistaken and hurtful Federal policy." The people of Kansas and Oklahoma know in bitterness it is a hurtful and a mistaken policy.

Beyond doubt this Federal protection of the intershipment of prohibited intoxicating liquors would be dissolved were it not for the pressure of the liquor trade which is fattening on this defiance of the State laws and for the added strength of those who for some reason are petitioning the Senate not to lift the Federal shelter from those thus nullifying the State laws.

WHY THOSE SIGNATURES?

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for December 16 contains the information of petitions remonstrating against the passage of the Kenyon-Sheppard bill 4043, which strips the liquor trade of its Federal protection in defying the laws of prohibition States. Among the petitioners were Local Union No. 43, Beer Drivers and Stablemen, International Union of United Brewery Workmen of America; Local Unions Nos. 237, 246, and 279, International Union of United Brewery Workmen of America, all of St. Louis; the Trade Assembly of Joplin, all in the State of Missouri; and the National German-American Alliance of Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill.

Also, sundry telegrams in the nature of memorials from Strandberg, McGreevy & Co., the Southwestern National Bank of Commerce, the Densmore Hotel Co., Edward J. McMahan, the Bauer Machine Works, the Commerce Trust Co., the Niles & Moser Cigar Co., the First National Bank, the Kumpfs Insurance Agency, the Hodes Planing Mill, the A. J. Shirk Roofing Co., the Kupper Hotel Co., Charles Campbell, the Central Brass Works Co., Rothenberg & Schloss, the C. C. Yost Pie Co., and the Ridley Machine Works Co., all of Kansas City, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill.

What can not fail to impress the citizenship of the western and southwestern country is the presence among these signatures not only of the "beer drivers and stablemen" and brewery roustabouts but of the Southwestern National Bank of Commerce, the Commerce Trust, and the First National Bank, of Kansas City. In behalf of the citizens of Kansas and Oklahoma we must ask, Why?

One thing we believe, so long as Kansas stands the sight of an advertisement, document, bill, draft, check, or other matter relating to the signers of the above appeal against what the people of Kansas believe and know to be an absolutely essential safeguard of their altars and firesides will call up a definite recollection of the attitude of these parties toward this relief. And this we regret. Possibly they will also.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can not vote for this bill for the following reasons:

First. It is clearly unconstitutional. This is not a question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic by Congress nor is it a question of regulation by Congress. The purpose is to have Congress delegate the power to the several general assemblies of the country to make such police regulations as to them may seem proper relative to the inspection and seizure of intoxicating liquors in interstate trade. Congress is given full power to regulate interstate commerce. None of it is reserved to the States. Congress only has such powers as are conferred upon it by the Constitution. In no respect is it authorized to transfer this responsibility or power to the general assemblies.

Second. Waiving the question of the coustitutionality of the bill, it is unfair and unjust, because the validity of an interstate shipment may depend wholly upon the bad faith of the vendee or of somebody directly or indirectly connected with the transaction, and the property may be seized by the State authorities and confiscated before it reaches the consignee, though the consignor was acting in the best of faith.

Ours is a dual form of government. The powers of sovereignty have been divided. Part of them are retained by the State and part are delegated to the Federal Government. All powers not delegated to the Federal Government, and not prohibited to the States, remain with the States and with the people. And it must follow that all powers which are delegated to the Federal Government are not retained by the people, unless they are so reserved to be exercised concurrently.

"It does not admit of argument," says Chief Justice Fuller (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 560), "that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State."

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution gave to Congress the power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

Nowhere is any part of this power retained by the States or the people.

The police power rests with the States. The power to regulate commerce among the States is vested in Congress. Any student of this subject recognizes the fact that there may be and often is a twilight zone where it is difficult to say what acts of sovereignty relate to the commerce power and what to the police power. But wherever this difficulty arises the Constitution has not left it unsolved, because by Article VI it provides that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

It necessarily follows if there is any conflict of jurisdiction between the commerce power of the Federal Government and the police power of the States the former must prevail.

Chief Justice Fuller, in In re Raher (140 U. S., 555), says:

The power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, when the subjects of that power are national in their nature, is also exclusive. The Constitution does not provide that interstate commerce shall be free, but by the grant of this exclusive power to regulate it it was left free, except as Congress might impose restraint. Therefore it has been determined that the failure of Congress to exercise this exclusive power in any case is an expression of its will that the subject shall be free from restrictions or impositions upon it by the several States. (Robbins v. Shelby Taxing Dist., 120 U. S., 489.) And if a law passed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged powers comes into conflict with that will, the Congress and the State can not occupy the position of equal opposing sovereignties, because the Constitution declares its supremacy and that of the laws passed in pursuance thereof. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 210.) That which is not supreme must yield to that which is supreme. (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 448.)

What is it proposed to do by the Kenyon bill, so called? Section 1, as reported by the committee, reads:

That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Section 2 reads:

That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Stripped of its legal verbiage this bill in section 1 declares that the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means of any intoxicating liquor from one State to another, which intoxicating liquor is "intended by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, to be in violation of the law of such State," is prohibited.

And section 2 provides that all such intoxicating liquor, when transported into any State or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State, and before delivery to the consignee, shall be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers to the extent and in the same manner as though such liquor had been produced in such State.

A careful analysis of this bill shows:

First. That if any person, whether he be seller or purchaser or transportation company or any person directly or indirectly interested therein, or in any manner connected with the transaction, intends to receive or possess or keep or in any manner use said liquor in violation of law, then the transportation is prohibited. In other words, if the vendor in one State should sell intoxicating liquor in good faith to a vendee in dry territory in another State under the representations by the vendee that it was to be used for medicinal, chemical, pharmaceutical, or sacramental purposes, or if the common carrier in good faith transported the liquor to be used for such purposes, and, in fact, the vendee did not intend to use it for any of those purposes, but intended to use it in violation of the law of the State or of the county or of the township or of the municipality or of the residential district in which the consignee lived, the property could be seized by the officers of the State immediately upon its crossing the border line of the State and before it reached the consignee and could be confiscated, if the State by its law would so declare.

Second. It is also apparent that if the vendor living in one State should contract to sell and transport liquor to a vendee in another State for lawful use, consumption, sale, or storage, and the contract should seemingly be made in the best of good faith by both parties thereto, and the liquor was afterwards shipped, the vendee could refuse to pay for it, because he could say, "I did not at the time of the purchase intend to use, consume, sell, or store this liquor legally, but I intended to use it in violation of law."

Third. An examination of this bill further discloses, if it becomes a law, that Congress does not have any fixed policy with respect to either the transportation, the use, consumption, sale, or storage of liquors. It is an attempt to relieve the Federal Government from all responsibility. It is an effort to delegate or, if not to delegate, to abdicate the power which the people gave to the Federal Government over interstate commerce and leave it subject to the will of the several States and localities therein.

Fourth. In the State of Ohio we have county local option, township local option, municipal local option, residential district local option, and municipalities are clothed with authority to prohibit by ordinance the sale of liquor within their limits.

Elections can be had on this subject every three years in counties and every two years in townships and municipalities, and petitions may be presented and hearings may be had to determine the question every two years in residential districts.

There are 1,379 townships in the State of Ohio. Under the Kenyon bill, if enacted, the shipment of liquor from another State to any of these counties, townships, municipalities, or residential districts would be legal or illegal as they were wet or dry, and subject to change every three years in the counties and every two years in the other political divisions. Purchasers might live in dry territory and do business in wet territory and have their point of shipment either in wet or dry territory. The liquor which is ordered by the purchaser may be for legal use in the township where he does business or for illegal use in the township in which he lives.

Under the Kenyon bill, if an illegal use, or consumption, or sale, or storage, or transportation is intended by anyone directly or indirectly connected with the transaction, the liquor is subject to search and seizure and even confiscation at the State line. A train which is carrying passengers and merchandise may be stopped, if the State legislature should authorize, at the Pennsylvania line, in order to search for liquor intended for an illegal purpose by some consignee living near the Indiana border. And it is worthy of thought to consider just how an official is to determine whether this liquor is intended to be used legally or illegally.

Whether this legislation is right or wrong, whether it is politic or impolitic, I am not now going to consider further. I call attention to these facts especially in order to determine what the effect is going to be upon interstate commerce. Clearly, if this bill is constitutional, it would confer upon the several States the power to do the things which I have just described. And if the State did any of these things, would it not be placing a burden upon interstate commerce? Would it not directly hamper and interfere with the transportation of passengers and of all classes of commodities as well as of liquor when on an interstate train? Would it not embarrass traffic to have this train stopped at the Pennsylvania line in order to search for some liquor which it was thought was intended for illegal use in Cincinnati, Dayton, Columbus, or Toledo? Would it not interfere with the right of contract by the citizens of one State with citizens of another? Surely these acts would be burdensome to interstate traffic. In other words, such legislation would be a direct interference with the regulation of interstate commerce.

I think, therefore, that it is clear:

First. That the power to regulate interstate commerce was surrendered by the States and vested in Congress;

Secondly. That if it is vested in Congress, it does not remain with the States; and Thirdly. That if Congress has the power to permit the States to make any such regulations as I have referred to, it must be found in the Constitution.

Congress has no power of legislation save that which the Constitution gives it. Where, in the Constitution, is the authority given to the Congress whereby it can redeed—if I may use the term—this power back to the States from whence it came? Clearly it is not expressly given. In what clause of the Constitution is it impliedly given? This bill does not say "Congress is hereby regulating." It does say, in effect, "We grant permission to the States and to the several localities in those States to control interstate commerce, and they are to say whether interstate transportation is lawful or unlawful." In other words, 48 States may have 48 different policies respecting interstate shipments of liquor, and in each political subdivision of the State the manufacture or sale or use of liquor may be legal or illegal, depending upon the choice of each and upon the authority given to each by the general assemblies in the States in which it may be located.

Each locality ought to have the right to determine this matter for itself so far as it can consistent with constitutional authority.

I do not believe, sir, that it was ever the intention of the fathers, when the Federal Constitution was adopted, that this power over interstate commerce was to be shifted from State to Nation, and then from Nation back to State. If it was so intended, somewhere within the limits of the Constitution there would be some hint that such was the purpose.

The fact that this bill is presented is a concession that the States do not have the power to control the shipment from another State of intoxicating liquors or to search an interstate agency and seize the liquor prior to the delivery to the consignee.

It must therefore remain in Congress. If Congress can delegate this power to the States, it must be because Congress possesses that power under some provision of the Constitution. As the power to regulate commerce is clearly given to Congress, how can it be given back to the States? Where is the provision in the Constitution authorizing Congress to delegate this power back to the States, either by direction or by indirection? If there is no such power anywhere contained in the Constitution, then it seems to me that it is clear there is no authority under which this bill can be legally passed.

A transportation line leading from one State into another is an agency for interstate commerce. As an agency of interstate commerce, it is within the power of Congress to control it, and, being within the power of Congress to control it, though a portion of the line is within a State, it is, so far as the power of regulation is concerned, as much foreign to the State as is the territory beyond the boundaries of the State. The State can not regulate commerce which is beyond its boundaries, and neither, in my judgment, can it control or regulate the commerce which is conducted by an agency within the State so long as it is an interstate agency.

It is suggested with much plausibility that if the legislature can forbid or control the sale of liquor within the State, and can not control or regulate the sale of liquor therein by a man without the State, it is giving the man outside the State greater privileges than has the man within the State. This may be so, but, if so, it addresses itself only as to the question of what the law ought to be and not as to the question of what it is or can be made constitutionally.

Let us take the other horn of the dilemma. Assume for the sake of argument that the legislature has the power to forbid the sale and delivery by some one outside of the State to some one within the State, then we are conferring upon the legislature of a State the power to control the interstate commerce by a man without the State. In other words, the legislative power of the State is extending beyond the State and over a man who is not subject to its jurisdiction. From the standpoint of a citizen within the State present conditions may seem unfair, but no more unfair than is the legislation of the proposed character to the citizen of another State in the second instance just cited. All of this argument shows the wisdom of the fathers in leaving interstate commerce to the jurisdiction and control of Congress. And if we are not content with present conditions, we must change the form of our Government by amending the Federal Constitution. There is no escape from it.

In United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S., 1, 13) the Supreme Court says:

> It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power, and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run in the effort to suppress them of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

ADJUDICATIONS.

Let us now turn to some of the adjudications bearing upon the subject of interstate commerce in liquors to ascertain what light, if any, we can find upon the subject of the pending bill touching the power of the Congress and of the States.

In Bowman v. Chicago & North Western Railway Co. (125 U. S., 46) the question was the effect of a statute of the State of Iowa on the interstate shipment of liquors which forbade common carriers bringing into that State from any other State intoxicating liquors without first being furnished with a certificate of the auditor of the county to which it was to be transferred to the effect that the consignee was authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in that county. The defendant was sued as a common carrier in the State of Illinois for breach of duty in refusing to transport from Illinois to Iowa a shipment of liquor. The railroad interposed as a defense the Iowa State law. The court said (p. 486):

> Has the law of Iowa any extra-territorial force which does not belong to the law of the State of Illinois? If the law of Iowa forbids the delivery and the law of Illinois requires the transportaion, which of the two shall prevail? How can the former make void the latter?

> The subjects, indeed, upon which Congress can act under this power are of infinite variety, requiring for their successful management different plans or modes of treatment. Some of them are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulation affecting alike all the States. Others are local or are mere aids to commence and can only be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their special circumstances and localities. Of the former class may be mentioned all that portion of commerce with foreign countries or between the States which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulations, and that Congress alone can prescribe. Its nonaction in such cases with respect to any particular commodity or mode of transportation is a declaration of its purpose that the commodity or by that means of transportation shall be free. There would otherwise be no security against conflicting regulations of different States, each discriminating in favor of its own products and against the products of citizens of other States. And it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation.

Again, on page 489, in the Bowman case, the court quotes approvingly from Hall v. De Cuir (95 U. S., 488):

> But we think it may safely be said that State legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce or to interfere directly with its freedom does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress.

The court concluded:

> That the statute of Iowa, the validity of which is drawn in question in this case, does not fall within this enumeration of legitimate exercise of the police power. It is not an exercise of the jurisdiction of the State over persons and property within its limits. On the contrary, it is an attempt to exert that jurisdiction over persons and property within the limits of other States. It seeks to prohibit and stop their passage and importation into its own limits and is designated as a regulation for the conduct of commerce before the merchandise is brought to its border. * * * It is therefore a regulation of that character which constitutes an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject.

In Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) the court held:

> A statute of the State of Iowa prohibiting the sale of any intoxicating liquors, except for pharmaceutical, medicinal, chemical, or sacramental purposes and under a license from a county court of the State, is, as applied to a sale by the importer and in the original packages or kegs, unbroken and unopened, of such liquors manufactured in and brought from another State, unconstitutional and void as repugnant to the clause of the Constitution granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

This rule was later modified by the Wilson Act.

Chief Justice Fuller (p. 108), in the case just referred to, says:

> The power vested in Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes" is the power to prescribe the rule by which that commerce is to be governed and is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution. It is coextensive with the subject on which it acts and can not be stopped at the external boundary of a State, but must enter its interior and must be capable of authorizing the disposition of those articles which it introduces, so that they may become mingled with the common mass of property within the territory entered. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419.)

On August 8, 1890, Congress passed the Wilson Act. It provided:

> That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

This statute came up for consideration in In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545), and was sustained by the court. The question involved therein was as to whether liquors in the original packages could be sold in the State of Kansas under a law of the State forbidding its manufacture or sale. It will be noted that the only question before the court was the validity of a sale within the State. It did not involve the validity of the act of interstate transportation.

In Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412) the Wilson Act again came before the Supreme Court. The Iowa statute forbade any common carrier or person transporting from one place to another in the State any intoxicating liquors without first being furnished with a certificate from the county auditor to the effect that the consignee was authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in that county. The question in the case was, Does the Iowa statute apply to a shipment made in Illinois for delivery to the consignee in Iowa?

The liquor was seized by the constable shortly after it was removed from the train to the freight house, and was condemned and there destroyed. It had been held in the Bowman case that the transportation of merchandise from one State into and across another was interstate commerce, and was protected from the operation of the State laws from the moment of shipment whilst in transit and up to the ending of the journey by the delivery of the goods to the consignee at the place to which they were consigned.

And in the Rhodes case (170 U. S., 412), to which I shall hereafter refer, Mr. Justice White, in discussing the Bowman case, said:

> The fundamental right which the decision in the Bowman case held to be protected from the operation of State laws by the Constitution of the United States was the continuity of shipment of goods coming from one State into another from the point of transmission to the point of consignment, and the accomplishment there of the delivery covered by the contract. This protection of the Constitution of the United States is plainly denied by the statute now under review, as its provisions are interpreted by the court below. The power which it was held in the Bowman case the State did not possess was that of stopping interstate shipments at the State line by breaking their continuity and intercepting their course from the point of origin to the point of consummation.

In Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412) it was contended that the words in the Wilson Act "upon arrival in such State" meant "arrival at the State line." The court held that this meant at the place of consignment in the State.

The language of the learned justice shows how careful the court was to protect the power of the Federal Government over interstate commerce.

On page 421 the court says:

> But to uphold the meaning of the word "arrival," which is necessary to support the State law as construed below, forces the conclusion that the act of Congress in question authorized State laws to forbid the bringing into the State at all. This follows from the fact that if arrival means crossing the line, then the act of crossing into the State would be a violation of the State law, and hence necessarily the operation of the law is to forbid crossing the line and to compel remaining beyond the same. Thus, if the construction of the word "arrival" be that which is claimed for it, it must be held that the State statute attached and operated beyond the State line confessedly before the time when it was intended by the act of Congress it should take effect.

And if it was true in the case of the Iowa statute that the construction contended for by the State authorities would have the effect of extending its operation beyond the State, certainly the Kenyon bill would have a like effect and would operate upon the interstate commerce beyond the State line.

In the earlier adjudications upon this subject the Supreme Court took the extreme view of holding that goods in transit from a foreign country to a State of the Union or from one State or Territory to another continue to be interstate commerce and under the control of Congress after they were delivered to the consignee and so long as they remained in the original package. I believe that this was an extreme position to take, because the original package in which the goods were shipped was a mere incident of commerce, and after it was delivered to the consignee it became thereby commingled with the goods and property of the State and ought to be subject to the control of the State, for this reason if for no other, that the consignee is a resident of the State and is not primarily an interstate agency. His act in selling to a fellow citizen of the State is a State and not an interstate transaction. The railroad or other transportation company which extends its lines and its business from one State into another is essentially and primarily an agency of interstate commerce. If we are to permit the interstate transportation companies to be subject to the legislation of the several States through which they may pass, we will at once destroy commerce among the States and defeat the very purpose for which the third paragraph of section 8 of Article I of the Federal Constitution was adopted. If the police power of the States can adopt the regulations provided for in the pending bill while spirits are recognized as articles of interstate commerce, they can apply these same or similar regulations to any other article of commerce, and the effect would be to make the State the supreme law of the land instead of the Federal Constitution, with the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, as declared by the Constitution itself.

If I may be pardoned for so saying, I never had much sympathy with the doctrine laid down in the earlier cases that merchandise retained its interstate character so long as it remained in the "original packages." It seems to me that the interstate character of a shipment from one State to another continued only up to the time of delivery to the consignee, at which time the contract between the consignor and consignee is complete, and to say that it continued so long as the merchandise remained in the original package, even though it came into the hands of other parties by purchase, is carrying the doctrine too far. But, however that may be, the Supreme Court has repeatedly said that the original package was only an incident of interstate commerce.

I speak of this because the Wilson Act is sometimes referred to as a precedent for the Kenyon bill. Instead of its being a precedent for the Kenyon bill it seems to me that a careful consideration of the decisions based upon the act make it a precedent against the constitutionality of this bill, because of the narrow construction which was given to the phraseology of the Wilson Act by the court in the Rhodes case limiting the meaning of the words "upon arrival" as heretofore pointed out.

Can it now be said that because Congress sought to change the original-package rule, that this is a precedent for giving to the State the entire police regulation of all interstate business, or, to limit it to this particular class of goods, to the transportation of liquors by interstate agencies immediately upon their arrival across the boundary line of the State? Is the control of an incident of interstate business to be a precedent for the control of the very essence of the business?

That we must not so conclude clearly appears from what Mr. Justice White says in the Rhodes case, on page 422:

> If the act of Congress be construed as reaching the contract for interstate shipment made in another State, the necessary effect must be to give to the laws of the several States extraterritorial operation, for, as held in the Bowman case, the inevitable consequence of allowing a State law to forbid interstate shipments of merchandise would be to destroy the right to contract beyond the limits of the State for such shipments. If the construction claimed be upheld, it would be in the power of each State to compel every interstate-commerce train to stop before crossing its borders and discharge its freight, lest by crossing the line it might carry within the State merchandise of the character named covered by the inhibitions of a State statute.

In further discussing this branch of the subject the learned justice, on page 424, says:

> The purpose of Congress to submit the incidental power to sell to the dominion of State authority should not without the clearest implication be held to imply the purpose of subjecting to State laws a contract which in its very object and nature was not susceptible of such regulation even if the constitutional right to do so existed, as to which no opinion is expressed.

In Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438) the court was considering the validity of an act of the State of South Carolina and its effect upon interstate commerce. In the discussion of that case Mr. Justice White, on page 444, says:

> In the inception it is necessary to bear in mind a few elementary propositions which are so entirely concluded by the previous adjudications of this court that they need only be briefly recapitulated:
> (a) Beyond dispute the respective States have plenary power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors within their borders, and the scope and extent of such regulations depend solely on the judgment of the lawmaking power of the States, provided always they do not transcend the limits of State authority by invading rights which are secured by the Constitution of the United States, and provided further that the regulations as adopted do not operate a discrimination against the rights of residents or citizens of other States of the Union.
> (b) Equally well established is the proposition that the right to send liquors from one State into another, and the act of sending the same, is interstate commerce, the regulation whereof has been committed by the Constitution of the United States to Congress, and hence that a State law which denies such a right, or substantially interferes with or hampers the same, is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

On page 452 Mr. Justice White says:

> But the right of persons in one State to ship liquor into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States and does not rest on the grant of the State law. Either the conditions attached by the State law unlawfully restrain the right or they do not. If they do—and we shall hereafter examine this contention—then they are void. If they do not, then there is no lawful ground of complaint on the subject.

I will not stop now to read the South Carolina statute. After quoting it, Mr. Justice White says—page 455:

> The regulation, then, compels the resident of the State who desires to order for his own use to first communicate his purpose to a State chemist. It moreover deprives any nonresident of the right to ship by means of interstate commerce any liquor into South Carolina unless previous authority is obtained from the officers of the State of South Carolina. On the face of these regulations it is clear that they subject the constitutional right of the nonresident to ship into the State and of the resident in the State to receive for his own use to conditions which are wholly incompatible with and repugnant to the existence of the right which the statute itself asknowledges. The right of the citizen of another State to avail himself of interstate commerce can not be held to be subject to the issuing of a certificate by an officer of the State of South Carolina without admitting the power of that officer to control the exercise of the right. But the right arises from the Constitution of the United States; it exists wholly independent of the will of either the lawmaking or the executive power of the State; it takes its origin outside of the State of South Carolina and finds its support in the Constitution of the United States. Whether or not it may be exercised depends solely upon the will of the person making the shipment and can not be in advance controlled or limited by the action of the State in any department of its government.

I shall only take the time of the Senate to cite one further decision of the United States Supreme Court bearing upon this branch of the question. It is the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railway against Cook Brewing Co. (223 U. S., 70).

The Legislature of the State of Kentucky, on March 21, 1906, passed an act by which it was made "unlawful for any common carrier to transport beer or any intoxicating liquor to any consignee in any locality within the State where the sale of said liquors has been prohibited by vote of the people under the local-option law."

The Louisville & Nashville Railway Co. took the position that this applied to interstate as well as to intrastate transportation, and refused to receive for shipment beer consigned by the Cook Brewing Co., at Evansville, Ind., to points in Kentucky where the local-option law was in force.

The Kentucky statute was sustained by the court so far as it related to intrastate shipments, but was held ineffective as to interstate shipments.

On page 82 Mr. Justice Lurton, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, says:

By a long line of decisions beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100) it has been indisputably determined:

(a) That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.

(b) That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.

(c) That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee such commodities do not become subject to State regulation, restraining their sale or disposition.

The Wilson Act, which subjects such liquors to State regulation, although still in the original packages, does not apply before actual delivery to such consignee where the shipment is interstate. Some of the many later cases in which these matters have been so determined and the Wilson Act construed are Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412); Vance v. Vandercook Co. (170 U. S., 438); Heyman v. Southern Railway (203 U. S., 270); Adams Express Co. v. Kentucky (214 U. S., 218).

If, then, intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce, if it is not competent for any State to forbid a common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another, if such commodities do not become subject to State regulation until the act of transportation is concluded, as held by Mr. Justice Lurton in the decision just referred to as well as in the other cases I have cited, and if, as Mr. Chief Justice Fuller said in In re Rahrer, it does not admit of argument that Congress can not redelegate its own powers to the State, nor enlarge those of the State, how can the friends of the Kenyon bill hope to have its constitutionality sustained when the very purpose of the bill is to declare unlawful the shipment or the transportation of intoxicating liquors from one State into any locality in another State where they are to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used in violation of the law of such State by anyone directly or indirectly interested therein, or in any manner connected with the transaction?

I recognize the fact that the liquor regulations are not enforced as they ought to be. It is not right that sales should be made in localities which have voted dry. Constant defiance of the law by many of those engaged in the traffic have rightly aroused public sentiment. The remedy, however, is not to be found in more legislation, but in more vigorous enforcement of present legislation. Every locality has its police authorities clothed with ample power. If they are supported by public sentiment and perform their duties, there will be no cause for complaint. If they are not supported by public sentiment or they do not perform their duties, the remedy for existing wrongs is not additional Federal legislation, unconstitutional in character, but the creation of a proper public sentiment and the securing of officers who will perform their duties.

Congress some years ago gave, and properly gave, aid to the States in the administration of their police authority when sections 238, 239, and 240 of the Criminal Code of the United States were enacted.

Section 238 prevents any common carrier or employee from knowingly delivering or causing to be delivered to any person other than the consignee, except upon written order, any interstate shipment of liquor.

Section 239 prevents the common carrier from collecting the purchase price of interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors or to act as the agent of the buyer or seller of the liquor for the purpose of buying or selling or completing the sale thereof save only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same.

Section 240 requires that all packages shall be labeled on the outside cover so as to plainly show the name of the consignee, the nature of their contents, and the quantity thereof.

By this means the local police authorities can easily ascertain whether liquor is being delivered in their localities and to whom. In every hamlet and township the means of detection are at hand without attempting, by the pending legislation, to embarrass and burden the great avenues and agencies of commerce.

If the Kenyon bill is the sine qua non for law and order, it must be first authorized by an amendment to the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. All localities have at their very doors the same opportunities for search and seizure and confiscation after the delivery to the consignee that they could have at the gateways of commerce on the border lines of the State. If, in the opinion of the friends of this measure, the fathers made a mistake by conferring upon the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce between the States there is a lawful way to correct it, and that is by an amendment to the Constitution in the manner therein provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it is no part of my purpose to enter upon a discussion of the merits of this proposed legislation. In what I shall have to say I shall confine myself to the question of its legality.

I sympathize, I think, quite as much as the proponents of this measure with all practicable efforts which have for their object the curtailment or the prevention of the evils which we all concede follow from the use of intoxicating liquors. If I had the power to do so by my single pronouncement I would consign every drop of intoxicating liquor to the bottom of the ocean, because I believe that humanity would be far better off without it.

But, Mr. President, it is necessary not only that a proposed piece of legislation should be wise and just, but under our form of government it is necessary that it should be in harmony with the Constitution of the United States.

The bill which is now under consideration consists of two sections. By the first it is provided, in substance, that the shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquor from one State into any other, or from any foreign country into any State, which liquor is intended by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, in violation of any law of such State, is prohibited.

The second section provides that any such intoxicating liquor transported into any State, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State, and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquor had been produced in such State.

The purpose sought to be accomplished by each of these sections is precisely the same, namely, to allow the State jurisdiction over intoxicating liquors to attach upon the instant that such liquors, being carried in interstate transportation, cross the boundary line of the State to which they are consigned. It seems to be conceded, as indeed it must be conceded, that in the absence of the proposed congressional legislation any interference upon the part of a State, by statute or otherwise, with an interstate shipment of intoxicating liquor prior to its delivery would be void as constituting a regulation of interstate commerce, a subject committed by the Constitution to the sole jurisdiction of Congress. The proposed bill therefore constitutes an attempt upon the part of Congress to enable a State to deal with intoxicating liquors in a manner which and at a time when it would be utterly precluded from doing in the absence of any such legislation. Is not its effect, then, clearly to confer upon a State a power which it does not now possess? In the course of what I shall have to say I shall endeavor to establish the following propositions:

I. The purpose in giving to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce was to secure commerce among the States against conflicting and discriminating State regulations and to insure a free interchange of all legitimate articles of interstate commerce among the citizens of the several States.

II. Intoxicating liquor is a legitimate article of commerce, and so long as it is recognized as such it can not be denied the right of interstate transportation.

III. Regulation may take the form of prohibition only where the article in question has been outlawed, not by a few of the States, but substantially by the people of the Nation.

IV. In this respect the power of Congress over interstate commerce is not as extensive as it is over foreign commerce. In the latter case the Nation deals in its sovereign capacity and may prohibit importation from foreign countries altogether. And I may add it may prohibit importation from foreign countries altogether of any and every article. In dealing with the several States it can not altogether forbid the interchange of legitimate commodities.

V. Congress can not add to or take from the powers of a State. It can not by its silence or by any affirmative or permissive act enable a State to do anything which by the Constitution it is inhibited from doing.

VI. The State can not by statute, or otherwise, substantially interfere with interstate transportation, because such interference would be a regulation of interstate commerce. This is so, not because such action on the part of the State is opposed to the will of Congress, or to any act of Congress, but because it is opposed to the Constitution. Being opposed to the Constitution, it is self-evident that Congress can not by any form of legislation authorize the State to do what the Constitution forbids it from doing.

VII. The bill in question, if upheld, would necessarily result in a multitude of differing and conflicting systems of regulation, and this would subvert the whole intent, spirit, and purpose of the commerce clause, which is essentially to establish a uniform system and consequently forbid the establishment of a multitude of differing systems.

Mr. President, before I begin the discussion of the various propositions which I have laid down, I desire to call attention to some of the legislation which is now upon the statute books.

The legislation which has special reference to this subject now in force is, first, the so-called Wilson law. Under the provisions of that law, which was enacted in 1890, it is provided that intoxicating liquors shall, upon arrival in a State, become subject to the State laws enacted in the exercise of the police power.

This law, although comprehensive in terms, has been so limited by the decisions of the Supreme Court that it applies only to interstate shipments of liquor after they have been delivered to the consignee; that is, it permits the State, after the liquor has been delivered to the consignee, and therefore after the interstate transportation has ended, to be governed by the State law.

Second. Sections 238, 239, and 240 of the Penal Code forbid under a penalty (1) delivery of intoxicating liquor to any person other than the consignee, unless upon his written order, or to any fictitious person; (2) the collection of the purchase price of intoxicating liquor by any common carrier or acting as agent of buyer or seller; (3) the shipment of any liquor unless labeled on the outside to show name of consignee, nature of contents, and quantity contained.

Under this legislation the State has full power to seize and confiscate liquor after it reaches the hands of the consignee, and the sections of the penal code, by requiring delivery to an actual consignee and the plain marking of every package with the name of consignee and the quantity and kind of liquor contained, furnishes information which will enable the State to act.

The proposed bill attempts to go entirely beyond this legislation. The first section of that bill, I repeat, provides in substance that shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquor from one State to another, or from any foreign country into any State, is prohibited if the same "is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, * * * in violation of any law of the State enacted in the exercise of its police power."

Section 2 provides that all intoxicating liquor shall upon arrival within the boundaries of the State, and before delivery to the consignee—in express terms going beyond the Wilson law—be subject to the operation and effect of the police laws of the State to the same extent—mark you—and in the same manner as though such liquors had been produced in such State. In other words, that interstate commerce in this article shall be subject to the State laws just as intrastate commerce is subject to those laws.

Section 2 is an attempt on the part of Congress to allow any State to deal as it shall see fit with the interstate shipment of liquor immediately after it crosses the boundary line of the State. It therefore gives to the State the power to regulate and control an interstate shipment of liquor before the interstate transportation has ended, and constitutes, therefore, a clear delegation of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Section 1 seeks to do precisely the same thing by legislation so worded as to obscure its real intent; in other words, section 2 does directly what section 1 does indirectly. In both cases Congress itself does not undertake to prescribe the rule which shall govern the interstate transaction, but leaves it to be prescribed wholly by the State.

Now, not only does this proposed legislation seek to turn over to the States the power to thus regulate interstate commerce, but it gives identically the same power to each State to regulate foreign commerce. We have by our laws in the plainest terms invited foreign nations to make shipments of all kinds of intoxicating liquors to us upon complying with our laws with reference to the payment of duties, so that the foreigner in Paris or in any other part of Europe, looking at the Federal law, finds that he may ship to the United States and to any and every part of it wines or liquors of any description upon complying with those conditions. We now propose by this legislation to inject into the whole system an element which can but result in the utmost confusion. The merchant in Paris then must inquire, not only what is the law of the United States, but he must inquire what is the law of Kansas, what is the law of Iowa, and of the others of the 48 States. Even then his inquiry is not ended. He will find that in some States the sale of liquor has been altogether prohibited; in other States he will find that it has been left to various communities to determine the question. So he must inquire further. If his shipment is destined for county A in Indiana, he must ascertain whether a vote of the people has been recently taken and, as a result of the vote, whether the sale of liquor in that county has been forbidden. He may ascertain one thing or the other. Indeed, he may begin the shipment of his consignment of liquor to county A, relying upon the vote of the people in favor of the regulated saloon, and find, before his shipment has reached New York, that the people have reversed themselves and have voted in favor of excluding the regulated saloon and of absolute prohibition.

If the foreigner sends a shipment of liquor to Kansas, it may be held in the office of the collector in Topeka, and the State at that period—because the bill proposes no limitation upon the power of the State—may seize the consignment. It seems to me, without elaborating further upon the question, that this proposed legislation must of necessity, so far as it affects foreign commerce, result in indescribable confusion in the administration of our tariff laws.

It is conceded that Congress may not delegate to any State its authority over any subject committed to it by the Constitution. The people in framing the Government selected Congress as one of its agents, and empowered that agent among other things to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. The effect of conferring this power upon Congress was to deny it to the several States. The rule is fundamental that an agent can not delegate his authority. The question therefore arises whether the proposed legislation attempts this delegation. If it does, it is absolutely void. A correct solution of this question involves an inquiry into the extent and character of the commerce power as embodied in the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Let me say, before I come to that, that section 1 of this proposed legislation is absolutely unique. So far as my investigation goes it has not a parallel anywhere in the civilized world. What are the consequences to follow the violation of section 1? An act of legislation which the citizen is at perfect liberty to violate, or the violation of which produces no consequences whatever, may be wise and friendly counsel, but it certainly is not law, for law presumes a rule of conduct which the citizen must obey or suffer the consequences. So far as the Government of the United States is concerned, no penalty whatever is prescribed for its violation. Every consequence which will follow a violation will be imposed by a State law. How can Congress pass a law leaving each State to prescribe the effect which shall follow its disobedience? Moreover, we do not even authorize the State by statute to regulate finally; but, in the last analysis, by this section we permit the undisclosed intent of some unnamed and undesignated individual to regulate interstate commerce.

I. WHAT WAS THE PURPOSE IN GIVING TO CONGRESS THE POWER TO REGULATE INTERSTATE COMMERCE?

To ascertain this will reflect light upon the meaning of the provision, since the grant of the power must be interpreted with a view to the accomplishment of the end sought. The controlling purpose was to secure commerce among the States against conflicting and discriminating State regulations.

In Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 697), the Supreme Court said:

It is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation.

In Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton (122 U. S., 347, 358), the court, after quoting preceding cases, said:

The supreme authority of Congress over the subject of commerce by the telegraph with foreign countries or among the States is affirmed, whenever that body chooses to exert its power; and it is also held that the States can impose no impediments to the freedom of that commerce.

And again, on the same page:

The object of vesting the power to regulate commerce in Congress was to secure, with reference to its subjects, uniform regulations, where such uniformity is practicable, against conflicting State legislation.

In Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens (6 Wall., 31, 33), the court said:

And it was thus given, so far as it relates to commerce between the States, with the obvious intent to place that commerce beyond interruption or embarrassment arising from the conflicting or hostile State regulations.

In Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker (94 U. S., 238, 245), the court said:

The commerce clauses of the Constitution had their origin in a wise and salutory policy. They give to Congress the entire control of the foreign and interstate commerce of the country. They were intended to secure harmony and uniformity in the regulations by which they should be governed. Wherever such commerce goes the power of the Nation accompanies it, ready and competent, as far as possible, to promote its prosperity and redress the wrongs and evils to which it may be subjected.

In Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100, 112), the court said:

But the transportation of merchandise from one State to another is in its nature national, admitting of but one regulating power; and it was to guard against the possibility of commercial embarrassments which would result if one State could directly or indirectly tax persons or property passing through it, or prohibit particular property from entrance into the State, that the power of regulating commerce among the States was conferred upon the Federal Government.

In the case of Bowman v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465, 508), Mr. Justice Field said:

It is a matter of history that one of the great objects of the formation of the Constitution was to secure uniformity of commercial regulations and thus put an end to restrictive and hostile discriminations by one State against the products of other States and against their importation and sale.

"It may be doubted," says Chief Justice Marshall, "whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress. It is not, therefore, matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief, and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. To construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would tend to defeat an object, in the attainment of which the American Government took, and justly took, that strong interest which arose from a full conviction of its necessity" (p. 508).

And on page 484 the court said, quoting from Railroad Company v. Richmond (19 Wall., 584):

The power to regulate commerce among the several States was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating State legislation.

And on page 481 the court said, quoting from another decision:

It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power.

Mr. Justice Miller, in his lectures on the Constitution, says:

You would scarcely imagine, and I am sure you do not know unless you have given some consideration to the subject, how very important is that little sentence in the Constitution. It was the want of any power to regulate commerce as between the States themselves and with foreign nations which as much, and I am not sure but I am justified in saying more, than any one thing forced the States to form the present Constitution in lieu of the Articles of Confederation under which they had won their freedom and established their independence. It is difficult now for us to fully appreciate how strong was the tendency to separate, to quarrel, and to bring their adverse interests into collision, which grew out of the want of any general power in the Federal Government, as it then existed, to control the commercial relations of the States with each other (p. 433).

Hamilton said:

The competitions of commerce would be another fruitful source of contention. The States less favorably circumstanced would be desirous of escaping from the disadvantages of local situation and of sharing in the advantages of their more fortunate neighbors. Each State or separate confederacy would pursue a system of commercial polity peculiar to itself. This would occasion distinctions, preferences, and exclusions, which would beget discontent. The habits of intercourse, on the basis of equal privileges, to which we have been accustomed from the earliest settlement of the country, would give a keener edge to those causes of discontent than they would naturally have independent of this circumstance. * * * The opportunities which some States would have of rendering others tributary to them by commercial regulations would be impatiently submitted to by the tributary States.

And, quoting further from Hamilton:

The interfering and unneighborly regulations of some States, contrary to the true spirit of the Union, have in different instances given just cause of umbrage and complaint to others; and it is to be feared that examples of this nature, if not restrained by a national control, would be multiplied and extended till they became not less serious sources of animosity and discord than injurious impediments to the intercourse between the different parts of the Confederacy.

Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the court, said in Bowman v. C. & N. W. Ry. Co. (125 U. S., 465-493):

Can it be supposed that by omitting any express declarations on the subject Congress has intended to submit to the several States the decision of the question in each locality of what shall and what shall not be articles of traffic in the interstate commerce of the country? If so, it has left to each State, according to its own caprice and arbitrary will, to discriminate for or against every article grown, produced, manufactured, or sold in any State and sought to be introduced as an article of commerce into any other. If the State of Iowa may prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors from all other States, it may also include tobacco or any other article the use or abuse of which it may deem deleterious. It may not choose even to be governed by considerations growing out of the health, comfort, or peace of the community. Its policy may be directed to other ends. It may choose to establish a system directed to the promotion and benefit of its own agriculture, manufactures, or arts of any description, and prevent the introduction and sale within its limits of any or of all articles that it may select as coming into competition with those which it seeks to protect. The police power of the State would extend to such cases as well as to those in which it was sought to legislate in behalf of the health, peace, and morals of the people. It view of the commercial anarchy and confusion that would result from the diverse exertions of power by the several States of the Union, it can not be supposed that the Constitution or Congress have intended to limit the freedom of commercial intercourse among the people of the several States. "It can not be too strongly insisted upon," said this court in Wabash, etc., Ry. Co. v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557-572), "that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause was intended to secure." This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution. (Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S., 566-574; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419-446.)

And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, a State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce.

That the danger sought to be avoided by conferring upon Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce was not fanciful is shown by the attempts which have been made from time to time by the various States to enact discriminating legislation affecting interstate commerce.

I need not remind the Senate that one of the earliest cases in which the interstate-commerce clause was interpreted by the Supreme Court was a case of that character, where the State of New York had undertaken by its legislation to monopolize the navigable waters of that State. In the great case of Gibbons against Ogden the rule was clearly announced that that was not admissible; that that was a matter which belonged to the National Government; and that no State could be permitted, under the Constitution, to regulate commerce, because that would be to permit what had been done in that very case, namely, to enact hostile and discriminating legislation which would operate against the other States.

We have that trouble going on now in the United States. Congress has held, for example, that insurance does not fall within the operation of the commerce clause. Many of the States have therefore passed laws in effect discriminating against insurance companies of sister States and in favor of their own. It is well known that the necessity of uniform commercial regulation among the States was the principal cause which led to the framing of the Constitution.

If the doctrine should be established that this power, in whole or in part, could be surrendered to the States, we should witness not only conflicts among the legislatures of the several States but between the several States and Congress as well; and, as said by Mr. Justice McLean in Cooley v. Board of Wardens, etc. (12 How., 325):

From this race of legislation between Congress and the States, and between the States, if this principle be maintained, will arise a conflict similar to that which existed before the adoption of the Constitution.

If the proposed legislation should be adopted and be held valid, a single shipment of liquor, instead of being subject to one control, namely, that of Congress, might, and undoubtedly would to a large extent, become subject to two conflicting rules. Part of the journey it would be a legitimate article of commerce, freely accorded all the rights of protection afforded to other articles, and a part of the journey before the interstate transportation had become complete it would become an illegitimate article, possessing no right of transportation whatever.

A contract between a citizen of Illinois and a citizen of Iowa, by which the former agreed to sell and ship a quantity of liquor to the latter, perfectly valid by the law and enforceable in the courts of Illinois, would be invalidated by the law of Iowa.

II. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN FOREIGN AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

It is sometimes loosely said that Congress has the same authority to deal with interstate commerce that it has over foreign commerce, and that inasmuch as the power of Congress to prohibit the importation of articles from foreign countries into the United States is sustained, it has the same power to prohibit transportation from one State to another. It is true that the language of the Constitution conferring the power upon Congress in the two cases is identical; but the objects to which the language refers is altogether different. The Government of the United States in dealing with a foreign government deals with it in its sovereign capacity. Indeed, it does not need the commerce clause to enable it to regulate commerce with foreign nations; it does not need the commerce clause to enable it to forbid transportation altogether from foreign lands to this country. Congress may do in that respect whatever any other sovereign nation may do. We have passed embargo acts, prohibiting absolutely and altogether articles coming from foreign countries into this country. Does anybody pretend that we would have that power in dealing between the State of Pennsylvania and the State of California or between any other two States of the Union? We have no power, as the Supreme Court has said, to place an embargo wholly or partially upon legitimate articles of commerce passing from one State to another. In construing language we must not only pay attention to the words that are used, but we must pay attention to the objects upon which the words operate. If I say, for example, "you have control over your property and your children," I use precisely the same words with reference to both subjects, but I mean different things. Under your control of your property you may sell it, but under the control of your children you may not sell them.

In Groves v. Slaughter (15 Pet., 449, 505) the court said:

> The power to regulate commerce among the several States is given in the same section and in the same language, but it does not follow that the power may be exercised to the same extent. * * * The United States are considered as a unit in all regulations of foreign commerce, but this can not be the case where the regulations are to operate among the several States. The law must be equal and general in its provisions. Congress can not pass a nonintercourse law, as among the several States, nor impose an embargo that shall affect only a part of them.

And, yet, what is this legislation but an attempt to impose an embargo, so far as the State of Iowa is concerned or the State of Kansas is concerned or the State of Maine is concerned, against certain articles of commerce being sent from New York or Pennsylvania or Kentucky or some other State?

III. WHEN MAY REGULATION TAKE THE FORM OF PROHIBITION?

It has been urged by some that Congress under its power to regulate commerce may prohibit the transportation of certain articles from one State to another, and if it may do this, it may stop at any point short of absolute prohibition. An examination of the cases, however, will disclose that the power to prohibit has never been sustained except as to things which have been outlawed by the common opinion of the people or by reason of their impurity or diseased condition or misbranding, and so on, are not legitimate articles of commerce.

In the Lottery case—which is the case to which the proponents of this measure themselves refer—(188 U. S., 321) the Supreme Court sustained a law of the first character as—> necessary to protect the country at large against a species of interstate commerce which, although in general use and somewhat favored in both National and State legislation in the early history of the country, has grown into disrepute and has become offensive to the entire people of the Nation (p. 358).

And in that case the court was careful to limit its decision to the article of lottery tickets alone, as though precluding anybody from using it as a precedent for prohibiting any other class of property from being transported. At page 363 the court said:

> We decide nothing more in the present case than that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic among those who choose to sell or buy them; that the carriage of such tickets by independent carriers from one State to another is therefore interstate commerce; that under its power to regulate commerce among the several States Congress, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the powers granted, has plenary authority over such commerce and may prohibit the carriage of such tickets from State to State.

Therefore, by the express language of the Supreme Court itself in that case, we are precluded from using it as a precedent for prohibiting the carriage of articles from one State to another, unless they are lottery tickets.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah one question right on that point. What is the opinion of the Senator from Utah as to whether Congress could, if it so desired, prohibit the transportation of all intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I intend to discuss that question a little later along, although I may now say to the Senator from Iowa that that question is not involved in this controversy. This is not an attempt upon the part of Congress to prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors. Therefore the question is not material to that which we are discussing, but I think whenever intoxicating liquors occupy the same condition in this country which lottery tickets did, there could be no question about the power of Congress then to absolutely prohibit their transportation.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask the Senator another question——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, I think, until that time comes there is, to say the least, an exceedingly grave doubt as to whether Congress has any such power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are more States in the Union in which there is a better crystallized public opinion against the use of liquor than there were against the use of the lottery ticket.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are 8 States in the Union which have passed laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. There are 40 States under whose laws the sale of intoxicating liquors, under some circumstances, is legitimate and proper, but there is no State in the Union that has thus far undertaken to forbid the purchase or the use of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BORAH. Not for personal use, and I am not aware of any State that ever prohibited a man having a lottery ticket for his own personal use.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the last analysis I rather think that all liquor is for personal use.

Beginning with the assumption that Congress may have power to forbid all interstate transportation of liquors, it is argued that the bill under consideration is a partial exercise of that power and is therefore legal because the whole embraces the parts.

It may be first replied that Congress does not by the proposed act prohibit anything. Congress does not attempt to forbid transportation of intoxicating liquors at all, but, on the contrary, permits unrestricted transportation in all intoxicating liquors, so far as the declarations of Congress are concerned, unless in particular instances there is a State law upon the subject of the use, sale, or possession of intoxicating liquor which somebody connected with the transportation intends to violate. By the proposed act Congress does not attempt to regulate the transportation at all. The shipper will look at the act of Congress in vain for any rule governing his right to ship into another State. He must find his authority not in the law of Congress but in the act of the State legislature, and even there he does not find any definite rule, but in the last analysis his right to ship can only be determined by ascertaining the intention of the consignee or some other person connected with the transaction, which intention may be entirely undisclosed.

But in the face of this condition it is gravely urged that no delegation of authority is made to any State. The fallacy of this contention is so obvious that one can but marvel at the credulity or the assurance of those who proclaim it. To regulate commerce, as said by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Gibbons against Ogden, is to "prescribe the rule by which commerce is governed." Under the proposed legislation who prescribes this rule? Manifestly not Congress, because that body prescribes no rule whatsoever, but refers to rules to be prescribed by the various States, which rules may be as varied and as numerous as the States themselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator has indicated that in his opinion section 2 is unconstitutional as a delegation of authority to the State legislatures or to State laws.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been trying to indicate that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not, in his opinion, it would be any delegation of authority if that section were so amended that it simply declared, first, that intoxicating liquors themselves were of such a nature as to be dangerous to public morals and public health, and then provided that they might be introduced into interstate commerce only on condition that they should lose their interstate commerce character the moment they crossed a State line? In that case, the way I put it, the State law is not referred to in any way. All that Congress would say would be: "We let go of this subject, and therefore it falls within the powers of the State itself the moment it crosses the State line."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I dislike very much to express an opinion upon any matter which, as it seems to me, is not involved in the pending question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that it undoubtedly will be involved before we get through with the matter, and that is the reason I desired his opinion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to consider it when it is presented. I doubt very much whether that would help the matter at all, because, after all, we are to determine the substance of this thing. I do not think we can cover it up under any form of words and make that constitutional, by some form of expression or by some legislative argument, which in its essence is unconstitutional.

Mr. McCUMBER. The real point is, Can Congress divest that article of its interstate character the moment it crosses a State line and let go of it at that time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do no think so, Mr. President. I think, so long as intoxicating liquor is recognized by the laws of Congress and by the common consent of the majority of the States of the Union, it can not be declared illegal. In other words, Congress can not in one breath say that a thing is legitimate and then in another breath that it is illegitimate.

But conceding, for the sake of argument, the power of Congress to entirely forbid the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce, it does not follow that it may partially forbid it. If it prohibits, it must do so upon the ground that intoxicating liquor is not a legitimate article of interstate commerce. It would seem to be self-evident that Congress could not, by the same act of legislation, declare a thing to be a legitimate article and also an illegitimate article of commerce, and yet this is precisely what partial prohibition does, since the effect of it is to permit the article to move among some of the States and to forbid it to move among others. In the Lottery case the prohibition against the transportation of lottery tickets was absolute and complete. The rule was uniform. The decision of the Supreme Court would undoubtedly have been otherwise if Congress had provided that lottery tickets might be transported among some of the States and forbidden transportation among others. Whether a given thing is a legitimate article of commerce surely must depend upon the character of the thing itself and not upon the secret purpose which may be entertained by somebody as to its use.

The commodity clause of the Hepburn Act is also cited as illustrating the power of Congress to prohibit, but that was a regulation of an instrumentality of commerce. Congress did not prohibit the transportation of coal, but only prohibited the interstate carrier which produced the coal from itself transporting it. This was purely a regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. There was no difference between the two classes of coal in so far as the intrinsic quality of the commodity was concerned. One of them was impressed with the personal ownership, which was the same ownership as that of the carrier, and the other was not. In one instance Congress prohibited the carrying, and in the other instance it did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That was because of the impress upon the article of the relationship of the parties to the particular article. Why may we not say that when liquor is to be used in a specific way and for a specific purpose, it shall bear that imprint, and pass out of the channels of interstate trade?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have been undertaking to say all along why we can not do it. To my mind, the two cases are entirely different. A railroad company engaged in interstate commerce is an instrumentality of interstate commerce which Congress may regulate. It may not only regulate the articles which are carried in interstate commerce, but it may regulate the instrumentality by which they are carried. In that particular case it does not undertake to regulate the article; it does not attempt to prohibit its being transported; but it says: "You, an instrumentality entirely under the control of Congress so far as regulation is concerned, if you produce this article, must not carry it."

Mr. BORAH. Then that falls back upon the proposition that it was not excluded because of any intrinsic quality of the article, but because of a certain relationship of other parties to the article.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The article was not excluded at all. The instrumentality was excluded from carrying it.

Mr. BORAH. We do not exclude the liquor except because of its relationship to certain parties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand perfectly the position of the Senator from Idaho; but there we were regulating the instrumentality. We may say that certain railroad companies which bear a certain relation to a particular article can not themselves carry it, for reasons of public policy; but that would not prevent the article itself being carried by somebody else.

The Lacey law, which has been referred to, dealt with animals fera naturæ, which have always been held to belong to the State and not subjects of private ownership except with the consent of the State. The effect of the Lacey law therefore is simply to forbid the transportation of an article which is not property and therefore not the subject of commerce.

Reference has been made to the provisions of section 289 of the penal code. By this section Congress adopted for certain purposes the laws of the States in force at the time of the passage of the congressional act. It was as though the law of each State had been set forth in terms in the act of Congress. Instead of doing this the law is indicated by reference instead of by recital, but the law adopted becomes a law of Congress and is not enforced as a law of the State. The section recognizes in the plainest way that Congress would have no power to permit a State to legislate for the Federal Government by providing that these adopted laws should continue in force notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment by the States.

In other words, Congress simply found certain laws upon the statute books of the States which it thought applicable to certain conditions, and by its legislation it said: "We will adopt those laws as laws of Congress." The effect is the same as though it had set them out in full and had said: "This is the law of Congress." But it could not, by any sort of legislation, as has been recognized over and over again, say: "We will adopt any law upon this subject which the States may hereafter adopt," because that would be to delegate the power of Congress. It could not even continue the law in force in an amended condition, because to amend the law is to legislate quite as much as to make it originally. Congress, in the clearest way, has shown that it considers that it has no power to adopt the legislation of a State thereafter to be enacted.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR IS A LEGITIMATE ARTICLE OF COMMERCE.

The next proposition which I desire to discuss very briefly is that intoxicating liquor is a legitimate article of commerce, and so long as this is recognized it can not be denied the right of interstate transportation.

It may be conceded that if the time shall ever come when intoxicating liquor is outlawed by substantially the whole people of the United States, as lottery tickets were outlawed, that Congress may then forbid its transportation upon the ground that it would in that event no longer be a legitimate article of commerce. But this is not the case. To the contrary, it has always been recognized and still is recognized as a legitimate article of commerce, entitled to the protection of the Federal Government the same as any other article.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am interested in the Senator's discussion, as we all are interested in it. I should like to have the Senator restate his view, if he pleases, that a law must be uniform, or its application must be uniform, in all the States. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not quite that. If the Senator will be patient, I have, later along, some authorities to quote upon that precise question; and I intend to discuss it in that connection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wanted, at this point, to suggest that in the pure-food law we provided that condemned goods might be excluded from any State where the State laws were against them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that it did not cover the broad proposition that I thought the Senator was arguing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Impure food might be excluded by the State itself. The State has done that. Diseased meats or impure food can be excluded by the State without any law of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. And because of that fact they could not be transported to that State through the medium of interstate commerce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; because they are impure foods; and being impure, they are not legitimate articles of commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. We think liquors are worse than impure.

[Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with the Senator. The Senator can not get up any argument with me about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is against the rules of the Senate for any manifestations of approval or disapproval to be had in the Chamber, especially in the galleries. The Chair admonishes the galleries that if it is repeated, the Senate will have to take action to prevent its recurrence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I hope very much that a great piece of legislation like this will not be passed by the Senate of the United States in a spirit of mere emotion. There are some pretty grave questions involved in this matter, and I am undertaking to discuss them; and I am undertaking to discuss them under my oath as a Senator.

What I had said when the Senator from New Hampshire interrupted me is borne out by the decisions. In Bowman v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co. (125 U. S., 465, 501) the court uses this language:

> What is an article of commerce is determinable by the usages of the commercial world and does not depend upon the declaration of any State. The State possesses the power to prescribe all such regulations with respect to the possession, use, and sale of property within its limits as may be necessary to protect the health, lives, and morals of its people, and that power may be applied to all kinds of property, even that which in its nature is harmless. But the power of regulation for that purpose is one thing and the power to exclude an article from commerce by a declaration that it shall not thenceforth be the subject of use and sale is another and very different thing. If the State could thus take an article from commerce, its power over interstate commerce would be superior to that of Congress, where the Constitution has vested it.

In the License cases (5 How., 504, 599) Mr. Justice Catron said:

> If from its nature it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition from putrescence or other cause is such when it is about to enter the State that it no longer belongs to commerce, or, in other words, is not a commercial article, then the State power may exclude its introduction. And, as an incident to this power, a State may use means to ascertain the fact. And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the Federal power. That is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States. And to this limit must all the general views come, as I suppose, that were suggested in the reasoning of this court in the cases of Gibbons v. Ogden, Brown v. The State of Maryland, and New York v. Miln. What, then, is the assumption of the State court? Undoubtedly, in effect, that the State had the power to declare what should be an article of lawful commerce in the particular State, and, having declared that ardent spirits and wines were deleterious to morals and health, they ceased to be commercial commodities there, and that then the police power attached, and consequently the powers of Congress could not interfere. The exclusive State power is made to rest, not on the fact of the state or condition of the article nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws and asserted as the State policy that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist. If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation, for it takes from Congress and leaves with the States the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce instead of being paramount over the subject would become subordinate to the State police power, for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation is, in effect, the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but in a struggle must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated. The same process of legislation and reasoning adopted by the State and its courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that a State might wish to exclude whether it belonged to that which was drank or to food and clothing, and, with nearly equal claims to propriety, as malt liquors and the produce of fruits other than grapes stand on no higher ground than the light wines of this and other countries, excluded, in effect, by the law as it now stands. And it would be only another step to regulate real or supposed extravagance in food and clothing.

Not only are intoxicating liquors recognized by the usages of the civilized world to be legitimate articles of commerce, but Congress has itself repeatedly emphasized their character in this respect by legislation which has been in force since the foundation of the Government and still remains upon the statute books. It collects millions of dollars annually upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. It provides for the supervision of their manufacture and their inspection. It levies duties upon all kinds of intoxicating liquor when imported from foreign countries and thereby invites their importation into the United States.

In Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 1, 7), the Supreme Court, speaking of oleomargarine, said:

> In the examination of this subject the first question to be considered is whether oleomargarine is an article of commerce. No affirmative evidence from witnesses called to the stand and speaking directly to that subject is found in the record. We must determine the question with reference to those facts which are so well and universally known that courts will take notice of them without particular proof being adduced in regard to them, and also by reference to those dealings of the commercial world which are of like notoriety. Any legislation of Congress upon the subject must, of course, be regarded by this court as a fact of the first importance. If Congress has affirmatively pronounced an article to be a proper subject of commerce, we should rightly be influenced by that declaration.

The court then proceeds to refer to the various statutes passed by Congress, as, for example, the act imposing a tax and regulating the manufacture and sale, importation, and exportation of oleomargarine and other goods of the same character, and at page 9 it is said:

> This act shows that Congress at the time of its passage in 1886 recognized the article as a proper subject of taxation, and as one which was the subject of traffic and of exportation to foreign countries, and of importation from such countries. Its manufacture was recognized as a lawful pursuit, and taxation was levied upon the manufacture of the article, upon the wholesale and retail dealers therein, and also upon the article itself.

The court also refers to the fact that the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show that tax receipts from this source during the nine years beginning with the year 1887 amounted to over $10,000,000, and at page 12, summing up, the court concludes:

> Upon all these facts we think it apparent that oleomargarine has become a proper subject of commerce among the States and with foreign nations.

And the court adds:

> The general rule to be deduced from the decisions of this court is that a lawful article of commerce can not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it was manufactured or grown. A State has power to regulate the introduction of any article, including a food product, so as to insure purity of the article imported, but such police power does not include the total exclusion even of an article of food.

The same rule has been recognized with reference to intoxicating liquors by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, the last expression of the court being found in the case of Louisville & Nashville Railway Co. v. Cook Brewing Co. (223 U. S., 70). Mr. Justice Lurton, speaking for the court, said:

> By a long line of decisions, beginning even prior to Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100), it has been indisputably determined:
> a. That beer and other intoxicating liquors are a recognized and legitimate subject of interstate commerce.
> b. That it is not competent for any State to forbid any common carrier to transport such articles from a consignor in one State to a consignee in another.
> c. That until such transportation is concluded by delivery to the consignee such commodities do not become subject to State regulation restraining their sale or disposition.

It is therefore no longer an open question that intoxicating liquors are legitimate articles of interstate commerce which are entitled to the protection of the Federal authority to the same extent and under the same conditions as other commodities. Indeed, the bill under consideration itself recognizes the general legitimacy of this species of property as an article of commerce. If the article is outlawed in any particular instance under the provisions of this proposed law, it will not be by the will of Congress but by the will of the particular State or States. In particular instances the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors will be forbidden not because Congress has declared or intimated in the slightest degree that they are noxious, but because, and only because, somebody intends to violate a State law.

It has been repeatedly determined that although the several States possess their undiminished powers of police, that no law, although otherwise a proper exercise of the police power, is valid if the effect of such law is to substantially regulate interstate commerce. The Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This supreme law confers the power to regulate commerce upon Congress, and thereby withdraws it from the States. If, therefore, a State law which has the effect of regulating commerce be upheld, immediately that law becomes superior to the Constitution. In the absence of permissive legislation by Congress, it is perfectly clear that no State has the power to regulate in any degree interstate commerce, and the reason is that this power has been vested in Congress. Hence a State law of this character is void not because it is opposed to any congressional law, not because it is opposed to the will of Congress, not because it has not been permitted by Congress, but because, and only because, it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It would seem to be self-evident that if the action of a State is void because in conflict with the Constitution, that no act of Congress, which is the mere creature of the Constitution, either by affirmative action, by removing obstacles, or by declaration of any character, could render the State action valid. To concede such a proposition would be to admit an astounding paradox, namely, that while Congress may not itself violate the Constitution, it may in some manner justify or absolve a State in doing so. No sort of specious reasoning can establish the proposition that any department of the Federal Government, or that all of them combined, by any proceeding, can change that which is opposed to the Constitution so as to be in harmony with the Constitution, and yet it is to this conclusion that the proponents of the pending measure are inevitably driven.

Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases pointed out the distinction between the police power of the State and the commerce power of the United States in the following language:

> And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the Federal power. That is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State, and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States.

It must be conceded that any State law now in existence attempting to interfere with the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquor before such transportation is completed by delivery would be unconstitutional. Upon what theory can Congress pass legislation which will make an unconstitutional enactment constitutional? And yet it is gravely asserted that upon the passage of this bill State statutes concededly unconstitutional will become valid and operative.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in the License cases (5 How., 580), said:

> But it is equally clear that as to all future laws by the States, if the Constitution deprive them of the power of making any regulations on the subject, an act of Congress could not restore it.
> For it will hardly be contended that an act of Congress can alter the Constitution and confer upon a State a power which the Constitution declares it shall not possess. And if the grant of power to the United States to make regulations of commerce is a prohibition to the States to make any regulation upon the subject, Congress could no more restore to the States the power of which they were thus deprived than it could authorize them to coin money, or make paper money a tender in the payment of debts, or to do any other act forbidden to them by the Constitution.

In the case of Hanley v. Kansas City Southern Railway Co. (187 U. S., 617) the Supreme Court said:

> Transportation for others, as an independent business, is commerce, irrespective of the purpose to sell or retain the goods which the owner may entertain with regard to them after they shall have been delivered.

That being so, any law whose primary effect is to interfere with the transportation of an article of commerce from one State to another before the delivery to the consignee, no matter what the consignee or anybody else may intend to do with it, is a regulation of interstate commerce. The contract of transportation is to carry from the consignor in one State to the consignee in another. This transportation is a single, indivisible thing, and, as said in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, "the power must be exclusive. It can reside but in one potentate, and hence the grant of this power carries with it the whole subject, leaving nothing for the State to act upon." Until delivery to the consignee there is no place where you can stop and say, thus far it is interstate transportation and thereafter intrastate transportation. As expressed in the same great case, "the word 'among' means intermingled with. A thing which is among others is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States can not stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior."

If we may surrender to one State the authority to interfere with a shipment of goods from another State the moment it crosses the boundary line of the former, it logically follows that we may likewise surrender the power to the latter State to interfere with the shipment until it reaches the boundary line, and this would be equivalent to a total surrender of the whole power. The State in which the shipment originates being permitted to deal with the matter until it reached the boundary line and the State to which the shipment is destined being permitted to deal with it afterwards, the effect would be to prevent the shipment altogether, not by the exercise of the regulative power of Congress, but by the exercise of that power by the several States, and thus a power which the people have affirmatively devolved upon Congress would be delegated to other and distinct governments.

V. DELEGATION OF POWER UNDER BOTH SECTIONS.

I have perhaps already sufficiently discussed the proposition that the pending bill constitutes an attempt to delegate the power of Congress over interstate commerce to the States. That this is beyond the power of Congress no citation of authorities is necessary to establish. The Supreme Court has repeatedly so declared.

In determining the validity of a statute we must have regard to its substance rather than its form. No matter in what terms the statute may be written, if its natural and reasonable effect is to accomplish an unconstitutional result it is void; or, as stated by the Supreme Court in the case of Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S., 137, 150):

> * * * The purpose of a statute, in whatever language it may be framed, must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

In the case of Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 623) Mr. Justice Harlan said:

> The courts are not bound by mere forms nor are they to be misled by mere pretense. They are at liberty—indeed they are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority.

However artful the language, however cunning the hand of the draftsman, this effect, when discovered, determines the validity or invalidity of the act. A moment's reflection, it seems to me, will convince any candid mind that the effect of this proposed legislation is to give vitality and validity to an act of a State government which, in the absence of the proposed legislation, would be unconstitutional and void.

Congress can neither take from nor add to the powers of the States. It has been claimed that the validity of the pending measure is sustained by the Supreme Court in upholding the Wilson Act, but the Supreme Court has been careful to say in several cases, notably in Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412), that the effect of the Wilson Act was only to permit the State jurisdiction to attach after the delivery of the consignment to the consignee, so as to permit the State to regulate and control the sale of the article, whether in the original package or not, after such delivery, and that this right of sale was only an incident of interstate commerce, and not such commerce in its fundamental aspect. In other words, the substantive transportation of a commodity from one State to another ended upon delivery to the consignee. The right of the consignee to sell in the unbroken package was not a fundamental part of the interstate transaction but was a mere incident resulting therefrom.

It is urged, however, that this bill does not permit the State to legislate with reference to interstate commerce, but does nothing more than remove an impediment to the operation of the police power of the State. But it does more than this. In the absence of the proposed legislation by Congress the police power is inoperative because it conflicts with the superior authority of the commerce clause of the Constitution. This bill therefore seeks to give vitality to the law of a State which has none in its absence, and however we may endeavor to reach a contrary result by forms of words or devious methods of reasoning, we are at last always confronted with the same conclusion, namely, that the effect of the legislation is to permit the State to do something which the Constitution forbids.

Under section 1 of the bill no rule governing the interstate transaction is prescribed by Congress. In every instance we must determine whether a particular shipment may be made, not by reference to any regulation prescribed by Congress but by reference to a law of the State. As accurately said by one of the proponents of this measure:

> The beauty about this law is that it expands and contracts with the legislation of the State.

In other words, the State by its legislation may admit the article or forbid its admission. It may admit it this year and prohibit its admission next year. It may admit it under some circumstances to-day and under totally different circumstances to-morrow.

Whether intoxicating liquor shall or shall not be an article of lawful commerce depends wholly upon the will of the State. That the power to prescribe what shall constitute a lawful article of commerce is the power to regulate commerce is clearly shown by Mr. Justice Catron in the License cases (5 How., 599), where that distinguished justice said:

> What, then, is the assumption of the State court? Undoubtedly, in effect, that the State had the power to declare what should be an article of lawful commerce in the particular State; and having declared that ardent spirits and wines were deleterious to morals and health, they ceased to be commercial commodities there, and that then the police power attached, and consequently the powers of Congress could not interfere. The exclusive State power is made to rest not on the fact of the state or condition of the article nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws and asserted as the State policy that it shall be excluded from commerce. And by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist.
> If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation; for it takes from Congress and leaves with the States the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the State police power, for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subjects of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is in effect the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but in a struggle must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated.

The same process of legislation and reasoning adopted by the State and its courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that a State might wish to exclude, whether it belonged to that which was drank or to food and clothing; and with nearly equal claims to propriety, as malt liquors and the produce of fruits other than grapes stand on no higher grounds than the light wines of this and other countries, excluded, in effect, by the law as it now stands. And it would be only another step to regulate real or supposed extravagances in food and clothing. * * * For these reasons I think the case can not depend on the reserved power in the State to regulate its own police.

Speaking of the Wilson Act, in Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S., 412, 422), the court said:

If the act of Congress be construed as reaching the contract for interstate shipment made in another State, the necessary effect must be to give to the laws of the several States extraterritorial operation; for, as held in the Bowman case, the inevitable consequence of allowing a State law to forbid interstate shipments of merchandise would be to destroy the right to contract beyond the limits of the State for such shipments. If the construction claimed be upheld, it would be in the power of each State to compel every interstate-commerce train to stop before crossing its borders and discharge its freight, lest by crossing the line it might carry within the State merchandise of the character named covered by the inhibitions of a State statute.

And further on, at page 424, the court said that while the right to sell free from State interference interstate commerce merchandise was held—to be an essential incident to interstate commerce, it was yet but an incident, as the contract of sale within a State in its nature was usually subject to the control of the legislative authority of the State. On the other hand, the right to contract for the transportation of merchandise from one State into or across another involved interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect, and imported in its very essence a relation which necessarily must be governed by laws apart from the laws of the several States, since it embraced a contract which must come under the laws of more than one State.

In the Bowman case it was said:

Has the law of Iowa any extraterritorial force which does not belong to the State of Illinois? If the law of Iowa forbids the delivery and the law of Illinois requires the transportation, which of the two shall prevail? How can the former make void the latter?

In American Express Co. v. Iowa (196 U. S., 133, 143) the Supreme Court, after referring to the preceding cases, says:

Those cases rested upon the broad principle of the freedom of commerce between the States and of the right of a citizen of one State to freely contract to receive merchandise from another State, and of the equal right of the citizen of a State to contract to send merchandise into other States. They rested also on the obvious want of power of one State to destroy contracts concerning interstate commerce valid in the States where made.

In Vance v. Vandercook (170 U. S., 438, 452) the court said:

The right of persons in one State—

And I invite particular attention to this case—

The right of persons in one State to ship liquor into another State to a resident for his own use is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and does not rest on the grant of the State law.

And again Mr. Justice White said:

The right of the citizen of another State to avail himself of interstate commerce can not be held to be subject to the issuing of a certificate by an officer of the State of South Carolina without admitting the power of that officer to control the exercise of the right. But the right arises from the Constitution of the United States; it exists wholly independent of the will of either the law-making or the executive power of the State; it takes it origin outside of the State of South Carolina and finds its support in the Constitution of the United States.

And at page 446:

In the inception it is necessary to bear in mind a few elementary propositions which are so entirely concluded by the previous adjudications of this court that they need be only briefly recapitulated. * * *

(b) Equally well established is the proposition that the right to send liquors from one State into another, and the act of sending same is interstate commerce, the regulation whereof has been committed by the Constitution of the United States to Congress, and hence that a State law which denies such a right, or substantially interferes with or hampers the same, is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

How can a right derived from the Constitution be taken away by an act of Congress or by an act of the State, or by the combined acts of both Congress and the State? The right of a citizen of one State to contract with a citizen of another State for the sale and delivery of any legitimate article of commerce is equally derived from the Constitution and not from the grant of any State law. Upon what principle, therefore, can a State law prevent the execution of this contract, the right to enter into which is derived from the Constitution? And if a State law attempting to do so be void as an interference with interstate commerce in its fundamental aspect, upon what theory may Congress vitalize it? To ask the question is to answer it.

The sale of an article in the unbroken package is an incident of commerce, but it is not a necessary and fundamental part of it, for interstate commerce may be complete without any sale—and very often is where goods are imported for personal use—but without delivery to the consignee the interstate transaction has failed of fulfillment altogether.

Mr. Justice Woodbury, in the License cases, said (5 How., 619):

And what power or measure of the General Government would a prohibition of sale within a State conflict with if it consisted merely in regulations of the police or internal commerce of the State itself? There is no contract, expressed or implied, in any act of Congress that the owners of property, whether importers or purchasers from them, shall sell their articles in such quantities or at such times as they please within the respective States. Nor can they expect to sell on any other or better terms than are allowed by each State to all its citizens, or in a manner different from what has comported with the policy of most of the old States, as well before as since the Constitution was adopted. Any other view would not accord with the usages of the country, or the fitness of things, or the unquestioned powers of all sovereign States, and, as is admitted, even of those in this Union, to regulate both their internal commerce and general police. The idea, too, that a prohibition to sell would be tantamount to a prohibition to import, does not seem to me either logical or founded in fact. For, even under a prohibition to sell, a person could import, as he often does, for his own consumption and that of his family and plantations.

Now I come to the question which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggested a few moments ago.

VI. THE POWER TO REGULATE INTERSTATE COMMERCE IS ESSENTIALLY A UNIT AND NOT SUBJECT TO A MULTITUDE OF SYSTEMS.

Since the purpose of conferring authority to regulate interstate commerce upon Congress was to prevent a multiplicity of diverse and conflicting rules made by the separate States, it would seem to follow that the regulation of any given article must be uniform in character, and that varying regulations could not be justified upon the varying desires or opinions of the several States. If this were not so the evils which the consolidation of this power in Congress was intended to prevent would still exist.

In Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District (120 U. S., 489, 494) the Supreme Court said:

In a word, it may be said that in the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations and not to a multitude of systems. The doctrine of the freedom of that commerce, except as regulated by Congress, is so firmly established that it is unnecessary to enlarge further upon the subject.

In United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S., 1, 32) Mr. Justice Harlan in a dissenting opinion said:

Commerce among the States, as this court has declared, is a unit, and in respect of that commerce this is one country and we are one people. It may be regulated by rules applicable to every part of the United States, and State lines and State jurisdiction can not interfere with the enforcement of such rules. The jurisdiction of the General Government extends over every foot of territory within the United States. Under the power with which it is invested Congress may remove unlawful obstructions, of whatever kind, to the free course of trade among the States. In so doing it would not interfere with the "autonomy of the States," because the power thus to protect interstate commerce is expressly given by the people of all the States. Interstate intercourse, trade, and traffic are absolutely free, except as such intercourse, trade, or traffic may be incidentally or indirectly affected by the exercise by the States of their reserved police powers.

In Groves v. Slaughter (15 Pet., 505) this language was used:

The law must be equal and general in its provisions. Congress can not pass a nonintercourse law as among the several States nor impose an embargo that shall affect only a part of them.

In Oregon Steam Navigation Co. v. Winsor (20 Wall., 67) the court said:

This country is substantially one country, especially in all matters of trade and business.

In Hall v. De Cuir (95 U. S., 485, 507) the Supreme Court said:

Commerce among the several States as well as commerce with foreign nations requires uniformity of regulation; and that power is by the Constitution vested exclusively in Congress, as appears by the Constitution itself and by an unbroken course of the decisions of this court, covering a period of more than half a century.

In Walling v. Michigan (116 U. S., 446, 455), the court said:

We have so often held that the power given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States and with the Indian tribes is exclusive in all matters which require or only admit of general and uniform rules, and especially as regards any impediment or restriction upon such commerce that we deem it necessary merely to refer to our previous decisions on the subject, the most important of which are collected in Brown v. Houston (114 U. S., 622, 631) and need not be cited here.

And on page 456, quoting from Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 697), the court, speaking of the subjects of interstate commerce which are subject only to the exclusive regulation of Congress, said:

Some of them are national in their character and admit and require uniformity of regulation, affecting alike all of the States; others are local or are mere aids to commerce and can only be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their special circumstances and localities. Of the former class may be mentioned all that portion of commerce with foreign countries or between the States which consists in the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. Here there can of necessity be only one system or plan of regulation, and that Congress alone can prescribe. Its nonaction in such cases with respect to any particular commodity or mode of transportation is a declaration of its purpose that the commerce in that commodity or by that means of transportation shall be free. There would otherwise be no security against conflicting regulations of different States, each discriminating in favor of its own products or citizens and against the products and citizens of other States. And it is a matter of public history that the object of vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States was to insure uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation.

Suppose the proposed bill should be enacted. In the course of time somebody violates it. What follows? So far as the United States is concerned, nothing whatever. No penalty is prescribed by way of fine or imprisonment or forfeiture of goods or otherwise. So far as the Federal Government is concerned, the enactment will not be in any real sense a law at all, but only a piece of gratuitous and more or less irrelevant advice, and this having been given Congress simply washes its hands of the whole affair and retires permanently from the field. But the State of Kansas, for example, having by its law prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors and authorized a seizure and confiscation of such liquors within the State stops an interstate train at the State line and seizes a shipment of beer which it is suspected is being imported for the purpose of sale in violation of the State law. In the proceedings which follow the consignor, the consignee, or the railway company whose interstate operations have been interrupted challenges the action of the State as constituting a regulation of interstate commerce and therefore beyond the power of the State. What, then, must be the concession and contention of the State?

Obviously it must put in a plea analogous to a plea of confession and avoidance. It must obviously concede that its statutes and proceedings do constitute a regulation of interstate commerce, and one therefore prima facie beyond the authority of the State, but that this want of power on the part of the State has been supplied by the authorization or the permission of Congress. In the last analysis, the legality of the State action must rest wholly and alone upon the Federal statute, and whether we call it a grant or a concession or a permission, or by any other name, or by no name at all, in substance and effect a State power has been created or amplified by an act of Congress.

Over and over again we have been assured that this is not an attempt to delegate any congressional power to the State or to add to the power of a State, neither of which, it is admitted, can be done, but that the effect of the legislation is only to remove a little impediment which now exists to the exercise of the State power. Let it be conceded. What then? The pertinent inquiry suggests itself, What is this impediment which stands in the way of the State now doing what it will be permitted to do hereafter by virtue of this act of Congress? Is it a Federal statute which Congress may modify or repeal at pleasure? No. Is it some form of manacle which, Congress having forged, Congress may loose; some restraint which, having been imposed by Congress or some inferior authority, may be removed by Congress? No. Senators may delude themselves by ingenious phrases and plausible forms of lip logic into the belief that they are following straight paths, but always, like bewildered travelers lost in the woods, they must come back to the same point again and again, and that point is that the impediment which they seek to remove is one imposed by the Constitution of the United States, to prevail against which Congress is as helpless as the States themselves. Approached from whatsoever angle we please, this little impediment to be brushed aside so unceremoniously always reveals itself as the Constitution, which stands at the gate like the "flaming sword, which turned every way to keep the way of the tree of life." The conclusion is irresistible that we are by this legislation attempting to enable a State to exercise a power under and by force of an act of Congress which the State has no authority to exercise under the Constitution, and if our act be valid we shall have succeeded in making a Federal statute superior to the Federal Constitution.

There has never been a time in all our history when the necessity of adhering to the limitations of the Federal Constitution was more imperious than to-day. Constitutional principles must be made with reference to the generality of cases and not to exceptions. General rules sometimes of necessity operate harshly in occasional instances, and the temptation is always great to ignore or violate these principles whenever we come into contact with one of these exceptional cases. The danger, however—and it is a very real and grave one—is that if we violate the Constitution in order to bring about a good result, or what we fancy to be a good result, we have opened the door of opportunity for future violations where the result may be neither good nor wise.

As said by the Supreme Court in Scott v. Donald (165 U. S., 58, 91):

The evils attending the vice of intemperance in the use of spirituous liquors are so great that a natural reluctance is felt in appearing to interfere, even on constitutional grounds, with any law whose avowed purpose is to restrict or prevent the mischief.

But, as said by Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case (156 U. S., 1, 13):

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government—and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

And then follow these words of wisdom and of warning—

I have never subscribed to the doctrine that the end justifies the means. The step from virtuous necessity to doubtful expediency is very short and easily taken. We should be extremely careful not to do a forbidden thing upon the plea that good will result, lest we thereby establish a precedent for doing the forbidden thing to the undesired end that evil may follow. Whenever we violate the Constitution an example is set which is quite likely to come back sooner or later to vex us. It was Portia, I think, who said:

'Twill be recorded for a precedent,
And many an error by the same example
Will rush into the State.

Mr. President, I do not for one moment doubt the honesty of purpose of the good men and good women of the country who are urging upon Congress the adoption of this legislation. The sincerity of their belief in its wisdom and its legality I do not question. I sympathize with the purpose that they have in view, namely, to reduce the evils of intemperance; but, sir, that is not the end of the matter. Superior to my own desires and superior to the wishes of any part of the people stand the sovereign commands of all the people, which they have embodied in their Constitution, and these do not admit of disobedience or evasion upon any pretext. Honest legislators may differ, and frequently do differ, as to the interpretation and application of these commands, but no man who, after study and reflection, has reached a definite and settled conclusion as to the meaning of one of these commands may act in opposition to it without breaking faith with his own conscience.

If a man is guilty of an overt act of dishonesty, he may be compelled to suffer the penalty of the law and the scorn of mankind. What he does may be seen by others than himself, but into the secret chamber of his own intellect no eye save his own may penetrate. In that domain each of us is his own advocate and finally his own sole judge. If he be guilty of intellectual dishonesty his debasement, if he so wills, can be known only to himself, but while he pays no outward penalty he pays, nevertheless, in the uneasy and unhappy consciousness that he has betrayed himself. To be mistaken in one's judgment is a common and comparatively trivial fault; to deliberately violate one's honest judgment is as indefensible and contemptible an act as any man can commit. Everyone of necessity spends more time with himself than with anybody else, and he ought to so conduct himself that he may feel in decent company the major part of the time. The people of the country who are urging this legislation are not sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution. I am. The duty and responsibility of keeping the oath is mine, not theirs.

I am willing to go as far as any man ought to go in a liberal and broad construction of the Constitution in the interest of beneficent legislation. I am not willing to violate the plain terms of that great charter for the advancement of any cause, however near it may lie to my own heart or the hearts of others.

During the delivery of Mr. SUTHERLAND's speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to ask that the unanimous-consent agreement may be read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, February 10, 1913, at 3 o'clock, p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now formally lay the bill before the Senate. The title will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

After the conclusion of Mr. SUTHERLAND'S speech,

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I presume that other Senators have had a common experience with myself in the matter of receiving requests to vote against the pending bill, generally known as the Kenyon-Sheppard bill and generally understood to have for its object the prohibition of the shipment of liquor from a State in which it is lawful to sell it, to a State in which its sale is not legalized; an understanding based on a popular error, for the bill does not prohibit such shipment, but does subject it to the authority of the police power of the other State when it enters its jurisdiction and before it reaches the consignee, provided it had been purchased for the purpose of violating the laws of the State.

Powerful political influences from my own State, which is not a prohibition State except in spots, have been brought to bear on me by those who have been my personal as well as political friends, in the effort to have me vote against the passage of the bill, the parties generally basing their opposition on the two-fold ground that it was unconstitutional and a violation of the right of personal liberty.

To all I have answered that I could not do so consistently with my views of the rights of the respective States of the Union.

If either of these objections appeared to me well founded, I would vote against the bill, for I have taken an oath to obey the Constitution of the United States and I am now, as I have ever been, a strong believer in the right of the personal liberty of the individual citizen.

But while there may be a doubt in my mind as to the constitutionality of the bill, that doubt is not sufficiently strong to make me vote against its passage, for I can not justify myself in taking the position that unless a legislator was absolutely sure of the constitutionality of an act submitted to him it is his duty to vote against it, even though he thought the motive for its inception was proper and the result of its passage would be beneficial.

I hold, rather, that I have no right in such a case to attempt to block what I considered proper legislation, but that it would be my duty to assist in its passage and let the courts pass on the mooted question.

And so in this storm the safe harbor of unconstitutionality is not open to me for entrance.

So much for that part of the question.

As for the second part of the proposition, it will not be disputed that the right of the personal liberty of the individual citizen is subordinated to the greater right of the State to control that liberty within such bounds as are considered proper with reference to the well-being of the community at large.

The right of a State in the exercise of its police powers to regulate the liquor traffic within its boundaries or to suppress such traffic entirely will not be denied.

This bill permits the States to exercise the same police power over liquor shipped into its territory from another State that it could exercise over it if the shipment originated within its territory, a power that can not be exercised except for the purpose of preventing the violation of its own laws.

The effect of its passage will be to prevent the General Government from lending the force of its laws, either to assist the citizens of one State to violate the laws of another or to assist the citizens of the other State to violate the laws of their own.

I believe that while the General Government should be supreme in the exercise of the authority conferred on it by the Constitution, the States composing it should be supreme in the exercise of the authority reserved to them by the Constitution.

I believe further that it is the duty of the States to stand ready to assist the General Government in the exercise of its constitutionally conferred powers and that it is equally the duty of the General Government to stand ready to assist the States in the exercise of their constitutionally reserved powers to the extent not only of refraining from enacting laws that may tend to obstruct the proper State authority, but also of amending or repealing any existing laws that may have such a tendency.

Holding such views, I can not vote against the pending bill, but must vote for its passage.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. President, the liquor evil has been before the world since the beginning of history. The history of the Jews, the Greeks, and the Romans, the three ancient civilizations best known to us, show the different methods of approach to this great question. A referendum to the citizens of Rome, the imperial city that ruled the world, on the banishment of the temples of Bacchus, as saloons were then called, notwithstanding their protection of a god, resulted in Rome going dry. Rome went dry on the political slogan that the temples of Bacchus were headquarters of the demoralization of youth and the white-slave traffic. The saloon still maintains its ancient reputation, and in our time it has eliminated none of its evils, but has added others unknown to the ancient civilizations.

Bacchus, a god of great power, was not, I am glad to say, infinite in his attributes nor universal in his jurisdiction.

Bacchus was a riotous god. His birth was a tragedy amid thunder and lightning. His mother was consumed by the lightning and immediately on his birth departed to Hades. Hence the epithet, fireborn. The orphaned Bacchus was never mothered. He was put in charge of Persephone, the infernal goddess of death, daughter of the Styx and wife of Pluto and mother of the furies, whose reputation lies chiefly in the fact that she was abducted by Pluto and made queen of Hades. His nurses became insane, and the little kid was changed into a ram and brought up in the dark recesses of a cave. When he was grown he became insane and became a hobo. He compelled his female worshippers to leave their homes. In their frenzy mothers mistook their children for animals and tore them in pieces. The people, and particularly mothers, opposed his entrance to many countries. Ships that carried him had their masts and oars changed to serpents and Bacchus changed himself into a lion, and ivy surrounded the ship. The sailors were seized with madness and leaped into the sea. Homer calls him the "drunken god." He was the god of the tragic art. In the beginning of his career the Graces were his companions. Time wrought great changes in his companions, who were Bacchantic women, raging with madness, in vehement motions, their heads thrown backward, with disheveled hair, carrying in their hand cymbals, swords or serpents. Satyrs and centaurs, monstrosities slightly human in face, brutes in body, were his chums. Sacred to him were poisonous shrubbery, and among animals sacred to him were the serpent, tiger, lynx, and panther. The expression of his countenance in art is languid and shows a kind of dreamy longing, his head, with a wreath of vine or ivy leaves, somewhat on one side, his attitude is easy, like that of a man who is absorbed in sweet thoughts or slightly intoxicated. He is often seen leaning on his companions or riding on a panther or ass, tiger, or lion. On coins he is represented with the horns of a ram or a bull. The above forceful description of Bacchus, as given in the poets of Greece and Rome, and taken from the classical dictionary is so easy of interpretation that I will not apply it.

To regulate interstate commerce. What does "regulate" mean? It means to prescribe rules for, and to prescribe rules means primarily to restrict. Unrestricted commerce is not regulated. It is free and unrestrained and has no regulation whatever. The derivation of the word "regulate" is from "rego," which primarily means to keep straight (a very suggestive meaning in connection with this bill). The verb "reign" contains the primary meaning and Webster's first definition is to possess or exercise sovereign power or authority; to exercise government as a king or emperor; to hold supreme power. Webster gives the third meaning to have superior or uncontrolled dominion. The first meaning of regulate in the Century Dictionary is to adjust by rule, method, or established mode, to govern by or subject to certain rules or restrictions. To regulate a machine is to adjust the governor so as to restrict or confine its movements, to increase or lessen the power as occasion demands. To regulate a clock or a watch is to restrict its movements by a pendulum or compensating spring. Our forefathers in making our great Constitution used the word "regulate" in its ordinary use. They never intended to surrender the right of protecting their descendants from the greatest evil known to man. They pledged their fortunes as well as their sacred honor to guard the happiness of the people and not the interests of the saloon and the stillhouse and the lawbreaker. Our forefathers, who made our great Constitution, were great scholars and used words with great accuracy. They used "regulate," in my humble opinion, to mean that the power to restrict interstate commerce was in their hands to be used as the needs of the people required.

You, yourselves, Senators, gave that interpretation to the word when you prohibited the consignment of liquor to the Indian tribes. Later, when the Indian Territory became a part of the sovereign State of Oklahoma, the Supreme Court of the United States decreed that under your law consignments of liquor could not be transported to that part of Oklahoma which was formerly the Indian Territory. Have not we in Tennessee, in our father's house, a right to expect that you do as well for us and our children as you do for others? We simply ask for equal justice. We do not ask you to even help us execute our anti-liquor laws or delegate to us any power we do not possess. We simply ask you "to deprive liquors intended for unlawful purposes of interstate-commerce character, and let us deal with such imported liquors as we would with liquors of domestic production intended for the same unlawful purposes."

Your laws regulate nitroglycerine and its products. That means they restrict—they prescribe conditions. They prohibit entirely from the whole Union absinthe simply because it intoxicates, but another intoxicant is said to have the right of way even over the sovereign power of States and the Nation itself. I have been myself denied by quarantine the privilege of crossing into my own State to my own home because I did not have with me a health certificate, and I had not been in contact with any contagion. Cattle, sheep, horses, hogs, and plants of every description are stopped, regardless of loss to the owners, because of anticipated disease. To regulate, then, is evidently to restrict. It seems that the only commodity known to man that can not be restricted is intoxicating liquors. If disease of animals and plants constitutes the difference, intoxicating liquors are responsible for more diseases of the body than all other causes combined and in addition they send great multitudes to the madhouse, to suicides' graves; they destroy the will power, which alone constitutes true manhood. They undermine love and destroy homes. This great destroyer, the greatest evil known to man, seems to be in the estimation of great lawyers the only disease-breeding commodity that can have no restriction put upon it.

They had trouble in ancient times to regulate this same commodity, personified into Bacchus with such unusual power that he overcame all restraints by changing men that stood in his way into fowls, fish, or animals, according to his whim. Modern sovereignty, it seems to me, works the same trick by changing the meaning of very simple words. Even statesmen and chemists of the United States can't tell what whisky is. In my boyhood whisky had no restriction upon it whatever. It was sold at 10 cents a gallon anywhere—on the public highway, at camp meetings—and any illiterate plowboy could tell what whiskey was. Now that whisky is so disguised with Indian hemp, buckeye, mountain ivy, poison oak, sulphuric acid, chloral, and other poisons, I don't wonder that its definition involves problems too complex for great statesmen and chemists.

While our temperance laws in Tennessee are reasonably enforced in at least 80 per cent of the population and 95 per cent of the area, we are greatly hampered by the action of the Federal Government in protecting under the interstate-commerce law the shipment of liquor. We do not ask the Government to assist us in the enforcement of our temperance laws, but we do ask that when the liquor crosses the State line, that it shall become subject to the laws of our own Commonwealth. We do ask that you leave in our hands consignments of liquor after they come within our boundaries. The State of Tennessee has long passed her majority and is clothed and in her right mind. She thinks she, on the ground, knows her people after more than a century of acquaintance better than the General Government can know them, and asks that her discretion on this great question be supreme. She will be wise in the use of this discretion. She can discriminate between a proper consignment and one that is designed for a lawless purpose.

Mr. President, it is wrong for this great Government, the strongest in the world, to force this Pandora's box on our people.

Tennessee's yeomanry in the days of the Revolution, at King's Mountain, living on parched corn, turned the tide of disaster and made this great Government a possibility. Our incomparable Andrew Jackson, with a Tennessee army at New Orleans in the War of 1812, won imperishable glory for this Nation. In the Civil War, Tennessee furnished a great army on the side of the Union. The Republican Party of our State, largely composed of old Federal soldiers and their descendants, have united hands and hearts with the old Confederate veterans and their descendants, who constitute the very backbone of democracy, in support of this bill, and ask you simply to withdraw your protection from interstate consignments of liquor. We simply ask you not to give your protection to that lawless gang who, armed with your license, nullify the laws of the great State of Tennessee. Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, twice President of the United States, has some reputation on nullification. When he was your Executive, he did not allow your laws to be nullified. We ask you to-day to pass this Kenyon-Sheppard bill that you, the Senators of the United States may not by your votes nullify the laws of the great Commonwealth of Tennessee, the home of Andrew Jackson.

In reaching the conclusion that it was easier for people to do right without than with saloons Tennesseeans were following illustrious precedents. Many States of this great country preceded them in adopting this policy. North Carolina, her mother, had set the example. Tennesseeans, proud of their ancestry, love to follow where her mother leads.

This body of Senators, the greatest lawgivers in history, with the cooperation of the other House, preceded us. Every refreshment known to man, except intoxicating beverages, can be purchased in this Capitol. You said to the civilized world, by excluding liquor from the Capitol of this great country, it is easier to be efficient legislators without than with intoxicating liquors easily accessible to you.

If you Senators can do your work better without an easily accessible drink stand, how about indiscreet youth and the great masses of the plain laborers of our country? Tennessee congratulates you on this right course in this Capitol and would not force upon you a different policy if she could. Is it not in good form in this Chamber to quote from Him who is the truth, the life, the way of nations as well as individuals, from Him who is the author of all good, and whose precepts lie at the very foundation of all progressive civilization, on whose birth history pivots itself, "Do unto others as ye would that others do unto you"? If mankind could only even approach this ideal, it would solve the most complex problems of modern civilization, both national and individual.

Do not protect by your law of interstate commerce those who violate our laws. It is wrong to force this upon us. We are following your illustrious example, Senators. You taught us the way to make it easier to do right. It is wrong to thrust us back when we are simply walking in your footsteps. To give our State control of consignments of liquor when they cross the State line to within our jurisdiction is no precedent for other consignments of other commodities. You yourselves have set the example of making liquor different from other commodities. You have excluded liquor, and liquor alone, from this great Capitol. This in your estimation set it apart as different from other commodities. Your method of taxation has set it apart as different from all other commodities. The producer of liquor is not permitted by law to control or even have access to his own product except in the presence of your officers. No other product of man has such a brand of distrust upon it and its producer. It is a positive wrong and a positive discourtesy for you by your licenses and your protection of liquor to nullify our laws by your method of regulating interstate commerce.

Your quarantine stations in protecting the people against contagious diseases confine the citizens themselves regardless of their convenience, liberties, or comfort, and exclude them from access to their own homes and loved ones to prevent disease. You are right in this. Liquor kills more people than all wars and pestilences and famines and earthquakes combined. Yet this commodity, more deadly than all diseases combined, has right of way into the heart of a sovereign State in spite of the wishes of its people.

I am greatly gratified to-day that I stand on State rights with the Senators of Kansas. Kansas has made a heroic fight against the greatest evil known to man. Her leadership thrills my soul. I am proud to follow on this, the greatest problem of civilization, where Kansas leads. I have not always stood with Kansas on State rights. I bear on my body scars, but none on my heart, because 50 years ago I differed with Kansas on this great question. It is a happy omen that the bill bears the joint names of Senator KENYON, of Iowa, and Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas—North and South standing together for State rights.

My widowed mother, in sight of the smoke of distilleries, told me on her knee that it was wrong to make and sell liquor. I never went to a teacher from infancy to my graduation in a university who did not teach me it was wrong to handle, touch, or taste liquor. As a soldier boy in my teens I heard the general order of Gen. Robert E. Lee read at dress parade that liquor brought to his army should be in sealed packages, put in charge of the surgeons, and that the seal should not be broken till the wounded were actually on hand. It was a sober army that made him the most famous commander in history and put his statue in Statuary Hall by the side of the Father of His Country. My Father in heaven was good to me to give me such a mother and such teachers and such a commander. I reverence their memory.

I have tried as a father, as a grandfather, as a teacher, as a citizen to transmit this great lesson to those who are to come after me. I am glad to-day, as a Senator of the United States, that I have an opportunity to make a record on this, the greatest problem before the civilized world. I am not a lawyer; I can not meet the legal arguments of those learned lawyers on the other side. I have the greatest respect for their learning and ability; I covet to-day their equipment. I can say, and I do say, that if the Constitution of the United States stands in the way of this great reform the Constitution ought to be changed.

Pardon me for a personal allusion. I have spent more than 60 years in a boarding school for boys. No man can tell what a little carrot-haired, hatchet-heeled boy will develop into. In my boyhood at the Bingham School at the Oaks, in a remote part of Orange County, N. C., my roommate, a 12-year-old lad, later became the governor of his State. A college friend, Walter Clarke, has been for many years and is now chief justice of North Carolina. God has allowed me to live to see my own little student boys develop into such a splendid manhood as to worthily occupy seats in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives at the other end of this Capitol. Senator Edward Ward Carmack, a former pupil, was an honor to the Senate of the United States. He was a genius and a statesman and a martyr to the cause I represent.

I have seen others of these little boys later on the supreme bench of their State, and many of them learned judges of other courts. I have seen them wearing Episcopal robes and filling great metropolitan pulpits. I have seen them great authors, presidents, deans and professors in great colleges and universities and the headmasters of great schools. I have seen them great lawyers, great surgeons and physicans, great soldiers and manufacturers, and farmers. I have seen many of them in business become millionaires.

To see these boys make this splendid development is the loviest scene that God and angels look down upon. Such development makes happy fathers and makes a bird sing in mothers' hearts.

Oh! I wish I could be spared the contemplation of the other side that makes the devil and his emissaries rejoice and feel that they have come into possession of their very own. I have accompanied them to the madhouse for a living death while still in the flesh. I have accompanied them to suicides' graves, and seen them entangled in divorce suits—all love gone. I have seen them in dishonor in convict garb, their fathers ashamed and their mothers broken hearted, in each case a tragedy infinitely greater than the loss of the Titanic, that brought an investigation from this august body and also from the Parliament of England. Liquor did it every time. Having spent my life in the rural districts with the knee-breeches boys about me, I, like other men, dreamed dreams, but I never once dreamed that my name would ever be even considered for this great honor; but among those little boys the question of government may have been unique and not dignified enough to be even mentioned in this Chamber. But my conception of the proper function of government agrees with Gladstone, the prime minister of England and the greatest lawgiver of the last century, that government's proper function is to make it easier for people to do right. Tennessee, in three great contests, has said to you that it is easier for her people to do right without than with saloons. No intoxicating beverage can now be legally sold in Tennessee.

I am an optimist. The world is getting better every day. I saw in my boyhood liquor absolutely without restriction. It is now restricted in a thousand ways; I saw gambling untrammeled and indulged in everywhere, even on the public highway. It has been driven into guarded dens. I saw public betting on horse races—now a thing of the past. Lotteries in my boyhood used the mails. Their agents were everywhere. Dueling was common. A gentleman allowed himself to be punctured by bullets into a pepperbox to show that he was brave and a man of honor. Senators, America is aroused on the liquor question. Anglo-Saxons have won every reform that once caught the ear of the people. Liquor has got to go. God grant that I may help it go.

The world is stirred on this question. Children now live who will have to explain to their children what a saloon was, and why their ancestors tolerated such a deadly evil. But for the money invested in it it would already have been a thing of the past. Toleration of the saloon puts the dollar above the man.

Miss Frances E. Willard, the lovely and charming queen of womanhood, has the great honor of a statue in Statuary Hall in this Capitol. No honor has ever been bestowed more worthily. It was her work for temperance that made this bill a possibility. In her name and in the name of millions of charming white-ribboned women all over this great American Nation; in the name of the white-ribboned hosts of Tennessee, under the leadership of Mrs. Silena Holman, a mother and grandmother of a noble family, who for years, with womanly dignity and charm, has done more than anybody else in cultivating public sentiment in Tennessee in favor of lofty ideals of citizenship, and who, if usefulness to her people is the correct measure of statesmanship, is Tennessee's greatest statesman; in the name of all the fathers and grandfathers and mothers and grandmothers of this great Nation, who wish a clean environment in which to rear their offspring, in whom they have invested their very lives; in the name of all the schoolmasters of America, whose greatest ambition in life is to train a citizenship worthy of this the greatest Nation in history; in the name of all the Christian churches of America, who labor and sacrifice that all the people may have a right attitude to God and to man; in the name of all the boys and girls on whose ideals formed in youth and not on material prosperity, which you have so nobly fostered, the future glory and usefulness of this great Nation depends; in the name of our Father in Heaven, who said that righteousness and not material prosperity exalteth a nation.

When we come to you asking for a fish, do not give us a serpent that stings, that mars, that destroys, whose coil is in the stillhouse. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If applause in the galleries be repeated the Chair will certainly direct the Sergeant at Arms to clear the galleries. The Chair hopes that the occupants of the galleries will consider that this notice is given in the utmost good faith and sincerity, and that this offense against the rules of the Senate will not be repeated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, after listening to the eloquent speech of a new Senator I am moved to make a request, which is that by unanimous consent the rules of the Senate be so far suspended that the Senate may substitute for consideration the bill on the same subject passed by the House of Representatives for the bill now under consideration.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objects.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have been urged by a great many people, whom I respect very much, to vote for this bill. I can not vote for it, however, because I have come to a perfectly clear and definite conclusion in my own mind that the bill is not within the constitutional power of Congress, and with that opinion I can not with self-respect vote for the bill; I can not vote for it consistently with the obligation that I have taken to maintain the Constitution.

Nowadays, sir, when I say that a measure which is popular and which many of our citizens desire is unconstitutional I feel as if I were doing an injury to an old friend and subjecting that friend to obloquy, to censure, and to possible disaster; but, sir, it is only by observance of the rules of the Constitution that we can maintain the government of law as against that government of men which means the destruction of individual liberty. The maintenance of the government of law, the observance of declared principles and rules of action, is far more important than the fate of any bill regarding any specific subject that can be submitted to Congress; and, sir, I can not reconcile it with my idea of what is wise for the country and what is right for a representative in the Senate to cast a vote for a measure which seems to me to be unconstitutional in order to throw upon the courts the burden of declaring it to be unconstitutional. I believe, sir, that the effect of passing this bill—and I understand that it probably will pass—will be that the courts of the United States will have to say that it is beyond the constitutional power of Congress. I think they will have to say that or stultify themselves, and when they say that they will concentrate upon themselves a measure of unpopularity, of public censure, and of public impatience with the judicial establishment which we will have shifted from our shoulders when we vote for the bill believing it to be unconstitutional. I think I shall be the better satisfied to take that burden on my own shoulders, and therefore I shall vote against the bill, because I think it is not permitted by the Constitution.

The bill has two sections. The last one is a simple and direct section which provides that all intoxicating liquors upon arriving within the boundaries of a State shall be subject to the police laws of the State. I think the friends of the bill have practically conceded that that is not constitutional. I think they are right. I do not see how they can avoid that conclusion. Still, in my judgment, it is much the least objectionable of the two sections of the bill.

The other section provides that the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means of any intoxicating liquor into any State, whether from a foreign country or from any other State, is prohibited if the intoxicating liquor—> is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, * * * enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State—

And so on.

Mr. President, that provision seems to me to be open to a number of objections, which I shall proceed to state.

In the first place, it undertakes to charge the citizens of every State and the citizens of all foreign countries engaged in commerce with the United States with a knowledge of all the laws of every other State. I doubt whether we can, by law, charge a citizen of the State of Louisiana with knowledge of the laws of the State of New York. If the effect is not, as a matter of law, to charge that knowledge upon the citizens of each State, then it is to require what is impossible, that the citizens of each State shall become familiar with all the laws and all the facts upon which laws operate and receive effect in all the other States. If they do not know all the laws and do not know all the facts upon which those laws operate, such as the issue of licenses, the fulfillment of conditions, and so on, then they are penalized for their ignorance by having their contracts prohibited.

In the second place, the provision undertakes to invalidate the contracts of the people of each State by reason of the intention of some one else in regard to future conduct under the laws of other States. The laws of a given State require a common carrier to accept and carry an invoice of goods. The contract is obligatory. The contract is made. But under this provision, if it is effective at all, the contract is invalidated because some one besides the carrier, and it may be some one besides the shipper, has an undisclosed intention to violate, after the transaction of transportation is over, an unknown law in a different State. I do not think it is competent for us to invalidate contracts in that way.

I can not quite agree with the proposition that this law means nothing because it carries no penalty. I think the law, if it be effective, makes contracts made under it invalid and unenforceable. That is the general rule of law—that a contract made in violation of law is an illegal contract, an invalid contract, outlawed, and incapable of compulsion or of being made the basis of remedy in the courts. That rule of law is maintained as strictly and as clearly by the Supreme Court of the United States as it is in any jurisdiction.

A third objection to this provision is that it is simply and plainly a surrender on the part of the General Government of the power of regulating this interstate commerce and a delegation of that power to the government of the State in which the transaction ends.

The Supreme Court has described the origin and the operation of this rule by which the Government of the United States is to regulate interstate commerce as being a regulation by the Federal Government of a transaction which can not be regulated by the States because the transaction is in part within the jurisdiction of one State and in part within the jurisdiction of another State; and this rule, around which our Union has been built up, was established to prevent the conflict of rules in the State where the transaction begins with rules in the State where the transaction ends.

Sir, I say that the provisions of this first section abandon that rule and vest in the State in which the transaction is to end the power to regulate and control the transaction. It is not letting go of the transaction and leaving it subject to the police power of the State. It is letting go of the regulation of that commerce and putting it in the hands of the government of the State where the transaction ends.

There would be a different situation, sir, if we were undertaking to legislate about a known law of a State; if we were undertaking to say that goods transported into the State of Michigan in violation of a certain named law of Michigan should be subject to the penalties of that law. That is not what we do here, however. We make all transportation of this article of commerce subject to whatever laws may be hereafter passed by any State. And what is that, sir? Some States undertake to regulate the traffic in liquors by means of high licenses and make it illegal to sell without a license. Some undertake to regulate it by local option and make it legal to sell in one place and illegal to sell in another. Some prescribe the purposes for which the sale may be made and prescribe conditions of receiving certificates or evidences of authority to sell or to buy for the particular purposes. There is a great variety of provisions declaring when and how and under what circumstances and upon what conditions this traffic, the possession, the transportation, the sale, and the use of these articles shall be lawful.

The effect of this provision, if it takes effect at all, is that each State shall be empowered to say when and how and under what circumstances and upon what conditions this liquor may be transported into the territory of the State. The States can do that, because they can say that under any other conditions it shall be unlawful. Under this, sir, a State may by law permit the manufacture of distilled spirits within its territory and by law make it unlawful to have in possession distilled spirits manufactured out of its territory. There is no limit upon the regulation by every State of this kind of interstate traffic under the authority conferred by this bill. It is not giving up the regulation and allowing police law to take its place. It is handing over the power of regulation to the State into which the transportation goes.

Mr. President, one great trouble about this whole subject is that the States themselves have been unwilling to outlaw these commodities. We should have a much simpler situation if there were a State which made it unlawful to manufacture or sell or have in possession or use intoxicating liquors. That State, so far as it was within its power, would have declared that intoxicating liquors were not the subject of commerce. But so long as a State permits them to be manufactured in some way and in some places, to be sold in some way and in some places, to be held in possession for some purposes, to be used for some purposes, so long it still regards these commodities as the subjects of commerce.

What is proposed in this bill is that the Government of the United States shall hand over to the government of each State the right to say how and when and under what conditions interstate commerce in these articles of commerce, so treated and regarded by all the States, shall be had.

There is another objection, sir. That is, that this bill does not merely hand over to the State which is the terminus ad quem of this transportation the power to regulate interstate commerce within its borders, but it undertakes by Federal law to enforce in each State the laws of the other States. I beg Senators to observe the real significance of that. Let us say that the State of Iowa, which has stringent laws, is empowered by this statute, if it is passed, to declare the circumstances under which beer may be imported from St. Louis, in the State of Missouri. If the beer is carried in in accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa, it is a good transaction. If it is carried in in violation of those laws, with intent to sell without a license, with intent to sell in a "dry" town rather than a "wet" town, with intent to sell for one purpose rather than another, then it is a bad transaction, and the contract made in the State of Missouri is a void contract, made void by the law of Iowa.

So, sir, we are not merely delegating to the legislature of a State the power to regulate interstate commerce within its borders, which the Constitution prohibits to the legislatures of the States and vests in Congress, we are not merely abdicating our authority and refusing the performance of our duty to say when and how and in what manner this thing shall be done, but we are undertaking by Federal law to enforce in the State of Missouri the laws of the State of Iowa, by putting upon those laws, whatever they may be, whenever they may be enacted, the imprimatur of Federal authority, and we are stretching out the arm of Federal power over the State of Missouri, to say that no matter what laws she may make, if they are in contradiction of the laws of the State of Iowa, they are void and ineffective.

Sir, I should be very glad if there were some way in accordance with the Constitution in which we could help stop this traffic. Public opinion upon the subject has grown very rapidly within recent years. The time may come, and I shall be glad to see it, when the people of the United States will be ready to act as a whole in the suppression of this traffic. But until they are ready, until this process of education and enlightenment which has been going on in these past years in regard to this kind of traffic has come to the point where the people of the United States, whom we represent and who made the Constitution that governs us, are ready to act as a whole, we are bound to maintain the provisions of that Constitution and to perform the duties it has imposed upon us; and the people of every State are bound, in loyalty to their country, to do the best they can to enforce their own laws in subordination to the directions of that Constitution.

If I may say one thing more, sir, the real trouble in the enforcement of these laws comes from the fact that they do not prohibit this traffic. If they did, it would be easy to enforce them. It is because they make discriminations and allow the traffic to be legal here though illegal there, to be legal in this way though illegal in that way, to be legal upon one condition though illegal upon another, because when a man has liquor in his possession he is entitled to the presumption under the laws of the State that he is going to use it lawfully, that it is so difficult to enforce these laws. Instead of impressing the prohibition upon the traffic in general, everywhere and under all circumstances in the State, they are seeking to transfer the difficulty of making the discrimination and of enforcing discriminating and partial laws from the officers within the State to the people of other States through the prohibition of our statutes.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question before he sits down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. STONE. I do; for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to have the opinion of the Senator from New York as to whether or not it is within the power of Congress, should Congress see fit to do it, to absolutely prohibit the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, my impression is that it is within that power; but, of course, it is a subject which is not up for discussion, and upon which examination might well change my views. I have not examined the subject. It is but the general impression that a lawyer carries on a subject that he has not examined with special reference to the particular question. My impression is that it would be competent for the United States to do that thing.

Mr. BORAH. Just one more question. If it is within the power of Congress to absolutely prohibit the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce, is it not also within the power of Congress to prohibit the shipment of any part of that commodity which it may designate as a particular class?

Mr. ROOT. Not necessarily, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the whole include the part?

Mr. ROOT. Oh, yes; but the reason why I think Congress could prohibit the traffic in alcoholic spirits is the injurious effect upon the people of the country, the same reason that operates upon the States in enacting their prohibition laws; and that reason is a reason that must be followed. You can not say that Distiller A may have his product treated as part of interstate commerce and Distiller B may not have his product treated as part of interstate commerce. You must follow the reason; and you can not hand over to the legislature of a State the power to say what part may be admitted to interstate commerce and what part may be excluded.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that proposition; but those of us who believe that Congress is not handing it over to the State, who believe that Congress has identified a particular class of that commerce and is itself excluding it from commerce, have no trouble in arriving at the conclusion that if you may exclude the whole you may exclude a part of the whole.

For instance, if the Senator from Missouri will yield just a moment further, in Kentucky a law was passed "to regulate the carrying, moving, delivering, transferring, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in local-option districts." That law prohibited its transportation entirely. The Supreme Court said:

> Valid as the Kentucky legislation undoubtedly was as a regulation in respect to intrastate shipments of such articles, it was most obviously never an effective enactment in so far as it undertook to regulate interstate shipments to dry points.

If a State may absolutely prohibit the shipment of all liquor and all commerce in liquor, may not the Congress of the United States, having the same power with reference to interstate commerce, its power being equally plenary, prohibit the shipment of all liquor in interstate commerce? Has the State any power over liquor in intrastate shipment that Congress has not over interstate liquor?

Mr. ROOT. I think it may. Yes; I think it may. I have already answered the question of the Senator. I have said that it is my impression that the Government of the United States would have the power to exclude all intoxicating liquors from interstate commerce. I do not think, however, that it can exclude intoxicating liquors from interstate commerce between two particular States. I do not think it can say that the State of Idaho can exclude intoxicating liquors from interstate commerce beween Idaho and another State. I think Congress itself must make the rule. The question whether the United States can exclude all intoxicating liquors from interstate commerce must depend upon the question whether intoxicating liquors are to be classified with flour, vegetables, wheat, the things which are necessary or useful to life, or whether they can be classified among the substances that are so injurious that they can be treated like putrid meat, injurious to health or dangerous to life.

If they are to be classified on that side, then they must be excluded, but they must be all excluded. You can not take a halfway step. You must declare them to be injurious to health and dangerous to life, or that in substance, so that they will be excluded as a whole. You can not exclude half and let in another half, because then you lose the reason in which you are justified in any exclusion.

Mr. BORAH. I will not delay the Senator from Missouri further.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I want about 15 minutes of the time of the Senate to say what I have to say respecting the pending bill. I do not wish to occupy more time than that, because I doubt whether it is in the best good taste, under the circumstances, on an occasion like this, when only three or four hours are provided for under the order of the Senate for any Senator to occupy a half or a third of that time. I believe other Senators should be given a chance briefly to state their views and to offer amendments and have them considered. I think it is a practice much abused for Senators, when an order such as this is made, with only a short period for them to speak, to defer their opportunity, which might have been taken advantage of on almost any day of many days previously, and to exploit their views at great length when the order is operating. I shall take but a few moments of the time of the Senate, out of deference to this view which I have expressed.

Mr. President, whenever a State determines to deal in a restrictive way with what is called the "liquor traffic" there are ordinarily two principal ways of treating the subject. One of these ways is to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State as a whole, or it may be to authorize municipalities within the State, such as counties or cities, to prohibit the sale of liquors within municipal limits whenever the people of any such muncipality shall, in accordance with law, determine upon that policy; this latter plan is commonly known as "local option."

The other usual way of dealing with this question is to regulate the traffic by statute instead of prohibiting it. Ordinarily when this plan is resorted to the statute provides for licensing those who engage as retailers in the business, prescribing the form of the licenses and the terms upon which they may be allowed, and fixing penalties for violations of the law.

Generally speaking, I have always believed that the liquor traffic could be best controlled and the best results obtained, especially in populous centers, by imposing license taxes upon those authorized to engage in the business, and to subject the business to statutory and police regulations. I have in my State always and consistently opposed the policy of State-wide prohibition, believing that it would be practically impossible to effectively enforce a prohibitory law in communities, especially in large communities, when in fact the dominant, all-prevailing sentiment was hostile to that policy. I have always believed that any attempt to force a policy of that kind on an unwilling people would be received sullenly and resentfully, and that it would lead to constant violations of the law, either covertly or openly. I have felt that such a situation was calculated to bring disrespect of law and public authority, and that it would lead to more or less public disorder. Hence, I say, I have always maintained, and still believe, that State-wide prohibition, especially in populous States like Missouri, would not be a wise policy for the State to adopt—less wise and less effective than a well-ordered regulatory system. At the same time I have for years consistently supported the policy of so-called local option—that is, the right of each local community or municipality to choose for itself whether it would have prohibition or a regulated licensed system within its borders. I have felt that the policy to be established in each municipal community, whether the one policy or the other, should be buttressed alone upon the expressed will and well-considered public sentiment of the community immediately affected, and not upon the will or public opinion of some other community. I have seen nothing in the course of my observation and experience to shake my faith in the soundness of these views.

In 1910, about three years ago, a constitutional amendment was pending before the voters of my State establishing absolute prohibition as the policy of the State, and State wide in its operation and effect. I opposed the adoption of that amendment. In published interviews and in public speeches I declared my belief that it would be unwise for more reasons than one to incorporate the proposed amendment in the constitution of the State. The amendment was defeated by a large majority. In my addresses to the people during that campaign I said, among other things, that I did not believe that the people residing in a so-called "dry" county should undertake, or be authorized by law to attempt, to impose their standard of morality or habit with respect to the use of wines and liquors upon the people of another county where a totally different public sentiment on that subject prevailed; and that equally would I suppose the right, or claim of right, of people residing in a so-called "wet" county imposing their standard upon the people of some other county having a totally different view and desiring a totally different policy. I contended that all this should be left to the people of each separate municipality, and that that would be infinitely better in every way than the plan proposed by the then pending constitutional amendment. During that campaign I conversed with scores of Missouri electors, living in dry counties, who told me that in the main they concurred in my view of the subject. They said that in their own counties they were, for various reasons, strenuously opposed to licensing or authorizing by law the carrying on of a liquor-selling business, but that if the people in other counties or sections held a different view they were willing for that people to settle that question for themselves. Undoubtedly that was the attitude of large numbers of men who voted against the adoption of the constitutional amendment for State-wide prohibition.

Now, Mr. President, I am receiving numerous letters from gentlemen for whom I have high respect, scattered over my State, reminding me of the position I took in the prohibition campaign of 1910, and with which they sympathized, asking me whether under my view of this whole subject, as often expressed, I did not think that I ought to support the bill now before the Senate. Frankly, I think I ought to support it, and I intend to vote for it.

Under the law as it now stands a State has the power to regulate the liquor traffic when it is carried on wholly within the State. For example, a State can by law forbid the shipment of liquors intended for sale from a point within the State to another point within the State which would be within so-called "dry" territory, and the State can, within this limitation, prescribe such penalties and devise such remedies as may be deemed necessary to punish or prevent a violation of the law. The State can control the business as long as the business is confined wholly to the State. But under the Federal law a citizen of one State may ship liquors into another State, and the consignment can not be interfered with by State authority while in transit nor until it is actually delivered into the possession of the consignee at the point of destination, and this even though the point of destination may be within dry territory. In other words, the State could, if it desired, forbid a liquor merchant in St. Louis, Mo., shipping a package of intoxicating liquors intended for sale to a dry county in that State; but a citizen of East St. Louis, Ill., could ship the same consignment to the same person at the same place without incurring the penalties of the Missouri statute and without fear of having the cargo interrupted or interfered with until it had been actually delivered to the consignee.

This would give to the outside shipper an advantage over the inside shipper, and at the same time would put the people and authorities of the dry county at a disadvantage in dealing with the outside shipper that they would not be subject to in dealing with the inside shipper. It seems to me to be both fair and right that whenever the people of a county of my State, upon mature deliberation, adopt the policy of local option they are as much entitled to protection against men outside of Missouri who have no respect for the law or public policy governing the community, as they are entitled to be protected against men living within the State who might wantonly intrude themselves and trample the law under their feet.

I think Congress has the constitutional right to so amend laws governing interstate commerce as to put intoxicating liquors outside the pale of that protection now thrown about them by Federal law, and thus subject them, upon arrival, to the law of the State to which they are shipped for unlawful use. Aside from my conviction that Congress has this constitutional right, I feel that the moral strength of the argument is in favor of the enactment of such legislation.

The pending bill, if enacted, would not be a criminal statute; it would not create a crime nor prescribe a penalty. It would not even forbid a shipment from one State into another. It would in effect merely strip these particular commodities of their character as articles of interstate commerce, and thus withdraw from them the protection the Federal law now throws over them against the law and police regulations of the State. It would merely put the shipper outside of Missouri or Iowa or Arkansas upon a level, that is upon terms of equality, so far as State law and regulation go, with the shipper within the State. I confess I am unable to see that any essential principle of sound constitutional law or any just claim of public or private right would be violated by the enactment of a statute of this character.

Such a law would not be violative of the Federal Constitution, but it would better enable the State to enforce its own internal policy, and thus at the same time promote that comity that ought in such cases and within proper limits to prevail between the States and the General Government.

It is a settled doctrine now that each State, acting in its sovereign capacity, can, generally speaking, establish its own internal policy with respect to the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, and I can see no good reason, founded either in morals or public or private right, why the Federal Government should enact or perpetuate laws that militate against the assertion of the established public policy of the local sovereignty. With respect to prohibition I have never believed in the wisdom of a policy too extreme or drastic.

I have already said I have opposed State-wide prohibition in Missouri; but also I have favored local option. Mr. President, the liquor traffic has been brought into disrepute by abuse. Doggeries, joints, bootleggers—men who run their business without regard to public decency or public opinion—are the men who arouse, and justly arouse, a sentiment against the whole traffic that leads on to absolute prohibition. Men even of broad-minded and liberal views, who believe in the largest personal liberty consistent with public decency and order, halt when they see shameful things, and they will not tolerate situations that the moral sense of mankind condemn as bad and indefensible. Men engaged in the liquor traffic should themselves purge the business of disreputable establishments and practices, and should themselves have high regard for the law and public opinion. Otherwise they need not be surprised to see public sentiment against the business grow and spread in every direction. Personally I believe in the largest measure of liberty in personal habit and conduct consonant with public order; but that, Mr. President, is about the limit of personal liberty.

License to do something according to law does not confer liberty upon the licensee to do something else in violation of law. I am a strenuous advocate of personal liberty. I do not like the idea of any other man or set of men telling me what I shall drink or eat or wear or think. With respect to all these I not only prefer but I insist upon the right to follow my own judgment. This is fundamental. I resent any pretense of right put forward by any other man to regulate my personal habits so long as my habits are decent, orderly, and lawful. If one man does not desire wine at his table or to indulge in a social drink, that is his privilege. I would not dare to question the wisdom of what he does in this behalf for his own guidance. On the contrary, I would say he ought best to know his own limitations and what is good for himself; and in any event I would insist that he should be left free to determine all such questions for himself. But if another prefers to serve wine at his board or to indulge in a social libation, I am equally unwilling that any spirit or policy of intolerance should circumscribe his right.

Generally speaking, I believe in a broad view of this question, and in liberality of conduct and opinion with respect to it. Nevertheless the regulation of the liquor traffic is inevitable and necessary. How it shall be regulated is a question each State should determine for itself, and I think the Federal Government, instead of putting any serious obstacle in the way, should cooperate with the State in this behalf. With respect to this matter I have nothing to do with the local policy of other States; but with respect to Missouri, being long a citizen of that Commonwealth, I have not only an immediate interest in the subject but I have a right to express to my fellow citizens the opinions I hold as to what will best promote the general welfare of that great sovereignty. The people of Missouri may or may not follow my advice, and the people of your several States may or may not follow your advice, but when the people of our several States speak we should all of us accept the verdict. Salus populi suprema lex esto is the motto of my State.

Mr. President, with this I close what I have to say on this subject. In many of its aspects it is a most interesting subject of more or less wide import, and it would require more time than I have taken to elaborate it if I felt disposed to enter upon the discussion with the idea of amplifying it at length. However, I am satisfied to state within the briefest possible compass, as I have attempted to do, some of the reasons that influence my judgment and will determine my course in supporting this measure, and leave it at that.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to renew the request that the rules be so far suspended that House bill 17593 be substituted for the pending bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the State that I in part represent had on its statute books for a great many years a prohibition law, but, through the influence and active work of the liquor interests of New Hampshire, that law was repealed a few years ago, and a local-option law took its place. Under that local-option law it was a question for the people of the several cities and towns to determine for themselves by a vote at stated times whether or not liquor should be permitted under license to be sold in those municipalities. A very large proportion of the State voted against licensing the traffic, when immediately the cities and towns that voted in favor of license flooded the nonlicense towns with liquor to an extent that became a scandal. The result was that the New Hampshire Legislature, at its earliest opportunity, passed a law preventing the sending of liquor into those no-license communities.

The action of New Hampshire in that particular is very similar to what is proposed in this bill; that is to say, this bill proposes that the States that prohibit the selling of liquor shall not be invaded by the States that do not prohibit it and which, for gain, send liquor into prohibition territory.

Mr. President, I am not even going to suggest whether or not this bill is constitutional, because I am not a constitutional lawyer; but a very distinguished member of the legal profession has made a suggestion to me that impressed me, and I want to put it in the form of an interrogatory to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is recognized as one of the best lawyers in this body. It is this: Is it not a fact that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce carries with it the power to define what shall constitute an interstate transaction and at what point the transaction ceases to be interstate? I ask that question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President; as the question is put, I will say not. Will the Senator let me have the paper from which he is reading?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The latter part of the question is "at what point the transaction ceases to be interstate"? Congress can not declare a thing to be not interstate which is interstate any more than it can declare that a white man is a black man.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question refers to interstate commerce. The word "commerce" was left out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, "interstate commerce." It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator answer directly the question? That is all I desire the Senator to do. I will read the question again:

> Is it not a fact that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce carries with it the power to define what shall constitute an interstate transaction and at what point the transaction ceases to be interstate commerce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Within limits, perhaps, yes, Mr. President; but if I were to give a categorical answer to the question I should say no, because what constitutes an interstate transaction is to be determined by the nature of the transaction itself. As I have already said, Congress can not say that a white man is a black man, when he obviously is not; and interstate transportation, of its own nature, begins when the article is delivered to the carrier and ends when the carrier has delivered it to the consignee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah will be somewhat troubled to sustain that position in view of our legislation in the pure-food law. I called the Senator's attention a little while ago to the fact that, under the pure-food law, we did prohibit interstate commerce in certain articles, and the Senator said, "Yes; impure articles," and cited tainted meats as an illustration, but the law goes much further than that, and I want to read one section of it:

> SEC. 10. That any article of food, drug, or liquor that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is being transported from one State, Territory, District, or insular possession to another for sale, or, having been transported, remains unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or insular possessions of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if it is intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found, and seized for confiscation by a process of libel for condemnation. And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, or of a poisonous or deleterious character, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of by destruction or sale, as the said court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, that applies to drugs which are defined to be below the standard as established by the Pharmacopœia of the United States and other well-known medical publications; it applies to the misbranding or the adulteration of certain articles, so that we halt those under the pure-food law, confiscate them, condemn them, and sell them. Now, I want to ask the Senator if that section does not contravene the claim that the moment an article enters into interstate commerce it can not be arrested and disposed of according to the law of the State, thus balking interstate commerce to that extent?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have made no such claim and no such suggestion. What I have said is that we, under the same law, might stop the transportation of intoxicating liquors if they are misbranded or if they are impure; but it is based upon the proposition that they are impure and upon the proposition that they are misbranded, as the law says, and when they are misbranded that constitutes an attempt to perpetrate a fraud upon the people to whom they are to be transported; and the courts have recognized that distinction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah merely one question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have but a few moments' time, but I yield for a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator from Utah—I am not personally clear as to the position he takes in that regard—to contend that Congress would not have the power to prohibit interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors unless they were misbranded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In other words, does the Senator contend that Congress has not the power to prohibit the shipping of intoxicating liquors simply as such?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I undertook in the course of my remarks to state exactly what my position about that was. In the first place, I undertook to show that that question was not involved in this case. I further undertook to show that I had no doubt, whenever liquors should be substantially outlawed by the people of the United States, that Congress then could forbid their transportation; but I had some doubt as to the power until that had been done, and particularly so long as it continued by its other laws to recognize liquors as legitimate articles of commerce.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it is involved in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am to occupy but a few minutes, and I will hasten, so as to give way to other friends of the bill. I have no doubt in my own mind that Congress in its plenary power can declare intoxicating liquors detrimental to the public health and public morals and can keep that commodity out of interstate commerce for that reason.

The Senator from Utah, Mr. President, in his very eloquent address compared the Constitution to a flaming sword which turned in all directions to protect the tree of life. Mr. President, it seems to me we are invoking the Constitution of the United States to-day to perform the functions of a flaming sword turning in all directions to protect the most destructive, the most disastrous, and the most terrible curse of our age and civilization; and it is worth while for us to take a little risk about this matter; it is worth while for us, even though there is a difference of opinion as to the constitutionality of this proposed law, to test it in the courts, if necessary, so as to have the matter settled once and for all. If there is any ground for believing that the law is unconstitutional, the liquor interests of this country, who are strong, wealthy, resourceful, and arrogant, will see that it goes to the courts for determination. There is no doubt about that. They will see to it that the Constitution shall not be violated at their expense, and no effort on their part will be withheld to have this law declared unconstitutional; but if, perchance, Mr. President, it shall prove to be a constitutional law, I submit to the Senate and to the country that the work we shall do to-day in passing the bill will have been work well performed, and the Senate will deserve the gratitude and applause of such of our people as believe that the liquor interests ought to be restricted in every possible, legal, and constitutional manner.

I have asked twice to-day, Mr. President, to have the bill that passed the House of Representatives on Saturday last—a bill similar in its general terms to the bill under consideration—acted upon at the present time. Unfortunately, under the rules of the Senate, that can not be done to-day except by unanimous consent. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has made a similar request, and in each instance objection has been made. So there is nothing left for us to do to-day but to pass a Senate bill and submit that for the consideration and the judgment of the other House of Congress.

I am of opinion at the present moment that when the vote comes upon the bill which is now under consideration I shall offer the bill that has come from the House of Representatives as a substitute for the Senate bill. If I do so, I shall do it in the hope and the belief that it will more likely become a law than if we send the Senate bill to the House as a separate and independent measure, couched in different language from that which is employed in the House bill.

Mr. President, I do not know how far the Constitution of the United States may prevent the individual State from being protected from interstate business in the carriage of intoxicating liquors, but I want to make one suggestion, and then I am done.

Suppose 47 States of the American Union adopted prohibition laws and the great State of New York alone remained anti-prohibition. Is it conceivable that those 47 States would allow the State of New York to dot its valleys and its hills with breweries and distilleries and send broadcast into the 47 other States a commodity that had been outlawed by those 47 States? I apprehend that if that situation ever could be brought about the people of the United States would find a speedy way to protect themselves from the sale and use of intoxicating drinks that had been brought into their communities from the one State that had refused to adopt the laws that the 47 other States had enacted.

So I say to-day that if any State in the American Union, representing the majority sentiment of the people of that State, sees fit to legislate outlawing the liquor traffic, it has a right to demand that it be protected by the Constitution and the laws of the United States from having that law nullified by the interstate transportation of liquor from other States into that community; and I shall esteem it one of the special privileges that has come to me as a Member of this great body to vote to protect those communities against what I deem, and what they deem, to be a great wrong, against which they ought to be protected.

I trust and I believe, Mr. President, that this great body, always desirous of promoting the best interests of the people of our country, will to-day register its verdict in a manner that will be fully understood and that will not be liable to misinterpretation—a verdict in favor of restraining this disastrous and demoralizing traffic in intoxicants to the least possible limits.

I have reason to believe, and I rejoice in the fact, that the verdict of the Senate will be such as to bring joy and happiness to thousands and thousands of homes and to millions of people in all parts of our country, many of whom are to-day in trial, tribulation, and sorrow because of the evils and the disastrous results of the sale and use of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, manifestly at this late hour it is impossible to discuss the bill before us at length. I am going, therefore, to confine myself to very general statements. While this is not a desirable way to discuss constitutional questions, I am compelled through want of time to do so.

My object in the first place was to discuss principally the second section of the bill. I do not believe the second section of the bill is constitutional. I believe it establishes a different rule and involves a different principle from that which is involved in the first section, and it was my purpose to state why I entertain that view. I shall not do so, however, in view of the fact that I understand the parties in charge of the bill are going to offer as a substitute for this bill the one that passed the house known as the Webb bill, and which is in effect the first section of this bill.

Assuming that probably the substitute will prevail, I am not going to take time to state why it seems to me the second section is inhibited by the provisions of the Constitution. I could not and shall not vote for this section in any event—entertaining the view which I do as to its unconstitutionality, But I want to say, while I am on my feet, just a word in regard to the first section, and why I think in a general way it is not subject to the inhibition of the Constitution. It may not be and perhaps it is not wholly free from doubt, but I think the doubt should be resolved in favor of the bill in view of the fact that it promotes wholesome legislation. In fact if it were not for certain decisions of the Supreme Court I might have arrived at a conclusion that it would also be unconstitutional. But in view of those decisions I feel constrained to resolve any doubt I entertain in favor of the bill.

This section provides:

That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

As I view it, Mr. President, Congress sees fit by this act to take a certain commodity, impressed with a certain quality or condition, and put it in a class by itself, and itself fix absolutely the rule for the carrying of that commodity or for its prohibition.

In my opinion, Congress has the power to say that no liquor shall be shipped or passed through the chanels of interstate trade if Congress sees fit to do so. I do not agree with the proposition that it is necessary to see how high public opinion shall rise in order that we may exercise that power or that our possession of it is dependent upon that fact.

I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to say that if the time should come when the people almost universally came to the conclusion that this ought to be done, we would then have the power to prohibit the shipment of liquor in interstate trade. I do not think I am mistaken about what he said. In my opinion, that would have nothing to do with the power of Congress to pass the law; neither would it extend, amplify, or limit the provision of the Constitution itself. If we have the power under the Constitution it is because of the provisions of the Constitution and not because of public opinion.

If, for any reason, substantial and basic, Congress concludes that any article of commerce in its shipment through channels of interstate trade is inimical to the public interests, Congress may prohibit its shipment. If it is an article or commodity which can fairly be said to be injurious to public morals to the welfare of society, Congress may take it out of the channels of interstate trade. It occurs to me that that proposition has been pretty well settled; and instead of relying upon original argument, I want to cite, as I can only have time to cite, a few extracts from one opinion.

In the Lottery case it was said, referring to the decisions which were there reviewed:

They also show that the power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

Further on they say:

If lottery traffic, carried on through interstate commerce, is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the States and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means, within the scope of the Constitution and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States?

If Congress comes to the conclusion that the shipment of liquor in interstate commerce, to be used in violation of the laws of the State, is inimical to the morals and the interests of the people of the United States, may not Congress take that particular class of commodities and inhibit its transportation in interstate commerce? May not Congress take into consideration in establishing a rule that the commodity is on its errand of law violation? May not Congress say, and with substantial reason say, we think any commodity which is being used in violation of law ought not to pass through the channels of interstate trade? Congress does not have to say that, but in determining the immoral and injurious effect of shipping a commodity, may not Congress take into consideration in addition to the general baneful effect of liquor that this particular liquor is being taken through the channels of interstate trade for the purpose of violating the law of a State?

The court says, further:

If a State, when considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits, may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another? In this connection it must not be forgotten that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself, and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution. What provision in that instrument can be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power granted? What clause can be cited which, in any degree, countenances the suggestion that one may, of right, carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals?

What provision of the Constitution has been pointed out to us or what principle is found in that instrument which protects a man in or gives him the right to ship liquor into a State in violation of the laws of that State? What inherent right belongs to an individual to take an article of commerce and to send it in violation of law among a certain community or among a certain people? Is it unconstitutional for Congress to say that we believe it tends to good morals and the public welfare that the laws of the States be obeyed and we will not furnish aid in their violation?

We can not think of any clause of that instrument that could possibly be invoked by those who assert their right to send lottery tickets from State to State except the one providing that no person shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. We have said that the liberty protected by the Constitution embraces the right to be free in the enjoyment of one's faculties, "to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts that may be proper." But surely it will not be said to be a part of anyone's liberty, as recognized by the supreme law of the land, that he shall be allowed to introduce into commerce among the States an element that will be confessedly injurious to the public morals.

It was said by the Senator from New York, in distinguishing this proposition, that we could absolutely prohibit the shipment of liquor of all kinds; but it was his opinion, as I understood his argument, that we could not take a part of that commodity which was being shipped under certain conditions and for certain purposes and single it out.

Mr. President, we fix the rule in this act of Congress. Congress does not leave it to the Sates to fix the rule. Congress fixes the rule, and says that whenever liquor is being shipped in violation of the law of a State, it itself declares that it shall be prohibited. In other words, it establishes the rule, although the operation of the rule depends upon certain conditions. When those conditions exist, the rule operates and applies to all shipments coming within that rule. Congress itself, however, selects the condition which must exist, and Congress classifies the commodity and Congress itself establishes the rule.

As a State may, for the purpose of guarding the morals of its own people, forbid all sales of lottery tickets within its limits, so Congress, for the purpose of guarding the people of the United States against the "widespread pestilence of lotteries," and to protect the commerce which concerns all the States, may prohibit the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another. In legislating upon the subject of the traffic in lottery tickets, as carried on through interstate commerce, Congress only supplemented the action of those States—perhaps all of them—which, for the protection of the public morals, prohibit the drawing of lotteries, as well as the sale or circulation of lottery tickets within their respective limits.

Congress was confessedly here, as stated by the learned justice, simply supplementing and making effective that which the States in their respective capacities had undertaken to do, but which they were unable to do. They could prohibit the shipping of lottery tickets within their own boundaries; they could drive them from commerce within the State; but they were unable to take them out of commerce as between the States. Therefore Congress proceeded to do that which the States could not do—supplement their action and make them contraband of commerce in the territory of the United States as an entirety.

May not we, therefore, in view of the way in which liquor is regarded, the evil consequences which flow from its use, the misery and crime which follow its consumption, take that article and prohibit it from interstate commerce, not only in its entirety, but to such an extent as in our judgment we think will promote the public morals?

In regulating commerce, are we limited to the exercise of this power in its fullest extent or not at all? If we may prohibit entirely, may we not prohibit partly? May we not exercise our judgment as to what will interfere with the morals of the people and what will not? It seems to me that having the power in its completeness, we may exercise it in its fulness, or we may limit our exercise.

It said, in effect, that it would not permit the declared policy of the States, which sought to protect their people against the mischiefs of the lottery business, to be overthrown or disregarded by the agency of interstate commerce. We should hesitate long before adjudging that an evil of such appalling character, carried on through interstate commerce, can not be met and crushed by the only power competent to that end.

And finally:

It is a kind of traffic which no one can be entitled to pursue as of right.

I undertake to say that it has been established too long in this country to be contradicted that the traffic in liquor is not one that a man can have as a matter of absolute right. From the time the article "issues from the coiled copper-colored worm in the distillery until it empties into the hell of death, dishonor, and crime" it is regulated and controlled. No man can deal in it as a matter of absolute right. He can do so only as either we, the Congress of the United States, when it is interstate commerce, or as the States, when it is intrastate commerce, say he may deal with it. He can not deal with it with unrestraint, he can not begin to deal with it other than as the public may by law decide is safe. It is looked upon as a baneful, injurious, exceptional commodity, and any man who sells must do so by permission. We may say that he may not send it through interstate commerce at all, or we may say he may send it upon certain terms or conditions, and it is not for the citizens to question the limitation which we put upon that act, which he has no right, except by our consent, to do at all.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a bill was passed in the House known as the Webb bill. An attempt has been made to substitute that bill to-day for what is commonly known as the Kenyon-Sheppard bill. That has not been successful, but a motion will be made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the words of the Webb bill. I very much hope that that motion may prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the time has arrived for voting upon the bill and amendments which may be offered thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to substitute House bill 17503.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what will be read.

Mr. PAYNTER. May I rise to a point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may, of course.

Mr. PAYNTER. I would like very much to have the Chair direct that the order under which we are proceeding shall be read and determine whether or not we have any right to take any action at all at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion that is made is simply to amend the bill. It is not for the purpose of substituting the House bill.

Mr. PAYNTER. I understand that, but is it proper for me to make an inquiry of the Chair with reference to the effect of the order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PAYNTER. That is what I am doing. I call the attention of the Chair to the language of the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the order read.

Mr. PAYNTER. I do not urge my view about it at all. I simply want the Chair to express its opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, February 10, 1913, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with appropriation bills, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered and upon the bill itself not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate has an amendment which was reported by the Judiciary Committee. That is the pending amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] now offers a distinct amendment.

Mr. PAYNTER. I have not made myself understood, Mr. President. I was trying to ascertain from the Chair whether, when the rule provides that the bill and amendment shall be voted upon not later than 6 o'clock, we can proceed after that hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would undoubtedly construe the order to mean that the Senate shall begin to vote at 6 o'clock. It would be impracticable to do otherwise.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let my amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert as a substitute the language which will now be read to the Senate by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the point of order that no substitute provision can be entertained until the friends of the original bill have had an opportunity to perfect it. The amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, it seems to me, would be the pending amendment. For myself, I think that is the only constitutional and effective way to deal with this question. If I had supposed that any such movement as this would take place it would have been my duty, holding the views I do, to have submitted my reasons for believing that the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee is the only effective way in which this great question can be dealt with.

I make the point of order now that we are entitled to a vote upon the proposition to amend the original bill before a counter proposition that goes to the life of it can be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under our rules it is clearly in the province of the Senate to amend either the original bill or the substitute. They are to be considered as separate questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the view taken by the Senator from Arkansas is correct and does not conflict with the view expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire. The Chair was going to submit to the Senate first amendments to the original proposition. It is proper, however, that the substitute and amendments thereto should be submitted to the Senate, but not voted upon until after the friends of the original measure have had an opportunity to perfect the same. After that has been done, the friends of the substitute will have a like opportunity to perfect that measure, and when each has been perfected by its friends the Senate will be in a position to judge and choose between the two. Upon that suggestion the Chair will state that the first question will be upon the amendment now pending, reported by the Judiciary Committee, to the original bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Let the amendment I offered to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from New York to the substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire the following words:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid the interstate shipment of liquors herein defined into any State, Territory, or District where the same are intended for sacramental purposes, or for the personal use of the owner or consignee thereof, or for the members of his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire whether it would be proper at this time for me to offer an amendment to the bill, to follow the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can now be received and read for information. If it were an amendment to that amendment, it would be now in order, but if it is a substantive amendment it will be voted upon afterwards.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is to be added to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order after that amendment has been acted upon by the Senate. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The SECRETARY. The committee report, on page 2, line 12, after the word "prohibited," to strike out the semicolon and the remainder of the bill and to insert a new section, to be known as section 2, to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether the amendment proposed by him proposes to change the amendment of the committee or is simply to add to it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It will be an addition to that paragraph, and it would somewhat change it. I think it is an amendment properly to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being so, the Secretary will read that first.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 2 reported by the committee the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be held or construed to render illegal or subject to State control the interstate shipment of liquors or liquids above described into any State or Territory to an individual for his personal or family use.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know that I heard that distinctly and correctly. I ask that it be read again, so that I may understand whether it allows shipments into another State for the personal use of a drunkard or a minor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again read Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the adoption of the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after the enacting clause, without taking anything from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not now be in order. It will be subsequently in order, but unless it is an amendment to the pending amendment it would not now be in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is an amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator stated that it was to come in after the enacting clause. The Chair does not know what it is. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let it came in prior, then, to section 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order later, but it is not an amendment to the pending amendment. The Chair is of the opinion that it is an independent amendment and not an amendment to the pending amendment. It will be in order after the pending amendment has been acted upon.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota.

The Secretary read as follows:

That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids, being commodities in their nature dangerous to public health and good morals, their shipment from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia into another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and allowed only on condition that their interstate-commerce character shall cease immediately upon their arrival within the boundaries of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to which they are consigned; and they shall thereupon be divested of their interstate-commerce character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the Senator moves that as a substitute for the pending amendment it will now be in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not intend it as a substitute, but I want to have it inserted in connection with the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order after the amendment of the committee has been acted upon. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee which has been read to the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the amendment be again stated. I think there is a misapprehension about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning in line 12, after the word "prohibited," the Committee on the Judiciary report to strike out the semicolon and the remainder of the bill and to insert:

SEC. 2. That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the boundaries of such State or Territory and before delivery to the consignee, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its reserved police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of this amendment and the yeas and nays were ordered thereon.

Mr. STONE. That is the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I understand from him, however, that he is for this bill and he has given me permission to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WATSON] has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I vote "yea." To explain my vote I will state that I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. Therefore I voted "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FOSTER (after having voted in the negative). I wish to inquire if the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER. Not knowing how that Senator would vote on this question and having a general pair with him, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state that the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is absent on public business.

Mr. STONE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. REED] is absent, and detained by reason of serious illness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 23, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to section 1 of the bill. Is that now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask if my amendment is not now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to call attention to the fact that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is first in order, unless the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is an amendment to that.

Mr. KENYON. It is not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it is not. Then, the amendment now pending is the one offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], which will be read.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that it be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read. The Chair has just directed that it be read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Chair to state that the amendment is intended to be inserted after the enacting clause and before the remainder of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As a distinct section. The proposition is to insert as a distinct section the amendment now to be read, without interfering with the other parts of the bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if it is a proper parliamentary inquiry—and I doubt it—I should like the Chair to state whether the amendment now proposed would not, in substance, displace the amendment of the committee just agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is perfectly competent for the Senate to adopt an independent amendment, and the question of its consistency or inconsistency is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. STONE. But it is well enough to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the enacting clause it is proposed to insert:

That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids being commodities in their nature dangerous to public health and good morals, their shipment from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia into another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and allowed only on condition that their interstate-commerce character shall cease immediately upon their arrival within the boundaries of the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to which they are consigned, and they shall thereupon be divested of their interstate-commerce character.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I think the Senator has forgotten or pretermitted something. This would not prevent any liquor being sold to Porto Rico?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unable to hear the Senator from Mississippi or to decide whether he is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was merely suggesting the propriety of an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment just read, to be inserted as an independent section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer at this time the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment offered to the original bill?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid the interstate shipment of liquors herein defined into any State, Territory, or District where the same are intended for sacramental purposes or for the personal use of the owner or consignee thereof or for the members of his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just offered by the Senator from New York as an independent section to the original bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. O'GORMAN.

Mr. McCUMBER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not that exactly the same amendment which was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and voted down?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. LODGE. This is offered to the House bill, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the same amendment in words.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I want to submit another point after the Chair has disposed of that one. I did not intend to interrupt the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has disposed of it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to any provision of the bill, since neither the bill nor the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee deals with the question of transmitting liquor in interstate commerce, but simply to divest a certain commodity of that character at the pleasure of the several States of the Union. It does not undertake to exclude by the exercise of national power liquor intended for any use, but leaves that matter exclusively to be determined by the States after the liquor shall have reached the State boundaries. I therefore make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the provisions to which it is sought to be added as an amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, if everyone were to construe the amendment offered by the Senate committee as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] construes it, there would be no need for this amendment, but others will not construe it as the Senator from Arkansas construes it. Therefore I urge the necessity of the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Those who violate this law——

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. O'GORMAN. Those who advocate this enactment profess to throw no restriction upon the personal use of intoxicants. I want that to be declared by the statute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, the point of order made that a certain amendment is not germane must be submitted to the Senate; it is not a question for the decision of the Chair. The Chair will, therefore, submit to the Senate the question of whether or not the amendment is germane. Is the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York germane to the bill? [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I will state that, if I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WATSON] is paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question if he were present.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Upon this particular matter, not knowing how either the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] or the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] would vote if they were present, I shall observe my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present and I were privileged to vote, I should vote "no."

The roll call was concluded.

The result was announced—yeas 41 nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Bacon	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smoot

Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Simmons

NOT VOTING—13.

Briggs	Foster	Reed	Williams
Chilton	Kern	Shively
Cullom	Massey	Warren
Fall	Penrose	Watson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question of the adoption of the amendment the yeas are 41 and the nays are 41, so the amendment is not adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the vote was not upon the adoption of the amendment, but upon the question of its being germane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair in stating the result was in error.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I presume the Senator from New York desires now to present the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the question was really upon the point of order, and the point of order is not sustained upon a tie vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, in my humble opinion that is not the question. The rule provides that upon the question of germaneness being raised the proposition shall be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It would require affirmative action of the Chair to decide that an amendment is in order, and it would therefore require the affirmative action of the Senate to decide that it is germane.

Mr. STONE. The Chair can not decide the question of germaneness, and, therefore, the Chair submitted the question to the Senate to decide, as a point of order, whether or not it was germane.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the point of order had been submitted without any provision in the rules which required its submission to the Senate, it would have been a question of sustaining the point of order. The rule of the Senate simply goes to the extent that instead of the Chair deciding it as a point of order it shall be decided by the Senate. The question really is whether the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not what the rule says. I should be glad if the Chair would have the rule read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have it read.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did not the Chair put to the Senate the question, "Is this amendment germane?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; but the Chair considers that——

Mr. McCUMBER. And the vote did not sustain the fact that it was germane?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I asked for the yeas and nays on the original amendment which I proposed, and that seems to be the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make the final ruling, and then it will be competent to appeal from the decision of the Chair if it is thought to be wrong. In the opinion of the Chair it was really a submission of the question of the point of order, and in the absence of an affirmative vote it is the opinion of the Chair that the point of order fails.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall not prosecute an appeal at this late hour; but I do not want the occasion to pass without saying that, if the hour were not so late and we were not so anxious to dispose of this matter, I should ask the judgment of the Senate on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be in error, but that is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the trouble about it, I think, is not in the present ruling of the Chair, but the fact that the question was erroneously put in the beginning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Possibly that is the case. The Chair recognizes that to be so.

Mr. WORKS. The Chair very clearly stated that the question was whether or not the amendment was germane, and I voted upon that understanding. Now, upon the ruling of the Chair, my vote is simply reversed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it is simply a point of order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE, Mr. LODGE, and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has this matter been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. O'GORMAN. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the yeas and nays have already been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska is correct.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary again read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

But nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid the interstate shipment of liquors herein defined into any State, Territory, or District where the same are intended for sacramental purposes or for the personal use of the owner or consignee thereof or for the members of his family.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is not that subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It certainly is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out all of the amendment after the words "sacramental purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to strike out all of the proposed amendment following the words "sacramental purposes." [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. McCUMBER. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws his request for the yeas and nays. The amendment to the amendment is rejected.

The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I again announce the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and state that if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am reliably informed that if he were present he would vote "yea." I therefore desire to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am requested to announce the pair of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. O'GORMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offered an amendment prior to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will now be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "by any person interested therein, directly or indirectly, or in any manner connected with the transaction," and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "Either by the consignor or consignee, or the agent of either thereof."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the section read as it is proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section as proposed to be amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, or wine, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, either by the consignor or consignee, or the agent of either thereof, to be received, possessed, or kept, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, enacted in the exercise of the police powers of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to strike out and insert as read by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be known as section 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. This act shall be in full force and effect on and after the 1st day of July, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments to the original bill, the substitute is now before the Senate, with the amendment which has been offered to it. The Chair understands that the amendment voted upon the original bill is identical with this, and therefore it will not be submitted to the Senate. The question is upon the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the language of the amendment which has been already read. It will be read again if desired. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases."

The bill as passed by the Senate is as follows:

A bill (S. 4043) divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation in any manner or by any means whatsoever of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended by any person interested therein to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used either in the original package or otherwise in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 11, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 10, 1913.

The House met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almightly Father, author and finisher of our faith, renew our confidence in Thee that we may go forward with unfaltering footsteps to the work of the hour, with an increasing consciousness of Thy presence to uphold, sustain, and guide us in right thinking and in right living, that we may walk worthy of the vocation whereunto we are called. In the spirit of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMERICAN IMPORTERS OF MANILA HEMP.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] rise?

Mr. BOOHER. To call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there are 20 Members of Congress in this Hall, and therefore I make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold it until we get through with these routine matters?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of House resolution 779, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that the House do pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] moves to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of House resolution 779, and to pass the same. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 779.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to advise the House, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, as to the facts regarding the exemption of American importers of manila hemp from payment of the export tax thereon, stating as nearly as may be practicable what amounts of money have been refunded to such importers by virtue of said exemption since the act of Congress of March 8, 1902, known as the Philippine tariff act, up to the present time, and to whom said amounts have been refunded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] moves to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to inquire of the gentleman if this matter has been called to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. HARDWICK. It has; but not on the resolution in this precise form. I think I had best make a brief explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The members of that committee are engaged at present, and none of them is here.

Mr. HARDWICK. This motion is made with the knowledge and concurrence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], who reported a similar resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I thought I was recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, on January 8, 1913, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] introduced a resolution involving precisely the same question as the resolution I now present. It was not, however, privileged under the rules of the House, because of certain statements of fact contained in the preamble and because the resolution as introduced by the gentleman from Virginia called upon the President, not simply for information, but also for certain conclusions. On January 16, 1913, the Ways and Means Committee unanimously reported favorably the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, after amending it by striking out the preamble.

In that form it was reported from the Ways and Means Committee by my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY]. When the Ways and Means Committee was reached on the last call of committees, on February 3, 1913, my colleague [Mr. BRANTLEY] endeavored to secure consideration of the resolution, but as the call was proceeding under unanimous consent he was unable to do so because of objection then interposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

In the meantime I had, on January 18, 1913, introduced a resolution embodying the same proposition as that involved in the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], but with the preamble omitted, and simply calling on the President for certain information, without asking him for any conclusions. In this form the resolution is privileged, and it was my right to call it up at any time after the expiration of seven legislative days, if the committee failed to report it. Before exercising that right, however, I conferred fully with both the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] and not only gave them notice of my intention to so call it up to-day, but also obtained their concurrence therein, as I have just stated to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and to the House.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution, in terms, merely calls upon the President to give to the House—the facts regarding the exemption of American importers of manila hemp from payment of the export tax thereon, stating, as nearly as may be practicable, what amounts of money have been refunded to such importers by virtue of said exemption since the act of Congress of March 8, 1902, known as the Philippine tariff act, up to the present time, and to whom said amounts have been refunded.

Mr. Speaker, I freely confess that I do not know what the facts are about this most important question. If I did, I should not ask for the passage of this resolution; but I do know that in a book entitled "The American Occupation of the Philippines from 1898 to 1912," recently published by a distinguished citizen of my own State, Mr. James H. Blount, who was for two years an officer of the volunteer forces of the United States in the Philippines, and for four years a judge of the court of first instance in the Philippines, it is charged that the International Harvester Co. and other American importers of manila hemp have in the last 10 years collected more than $4,000,000 in refund of export taxes on manila hemp, under the rebate system authorized by the Philippine tariff act of 1902 and the Payne Tariff Act of 1909, and that these amounts so refunded are, in effect, a free gift or subsidy to the International Harvester Co. and other American importers of manila hemp.

Ordinarily, Mr. Speaker, I should not care to base a resolution of inquiry, addressed to the President, upon mere statements contained in some book, but in this case I know the author so well and am so well acquainted with his high character and his splendid opportunities for accurate knowledge of conditions in the Philippines that I think his statements in reference thereto ought to receive attention and consideration. Besides, this House is entitled to know, and ought to know, just exactly what the facts are in reference to this hemp tax—whom it burdens and how much, whom it benefits and how much. We are entitled to accurate information on these questions for two reasons; first, in order that we may understand what has happened in the past and why, and, second, in order that we may know how we should legislate in the future. If it be true that this rebate of the export tax on manila hemp has had the effect of giving to one of our great American trusts practical control of the manila hemp market, to the injury of the people of the Philippine Islands, and a subsidy of several million dollars, the sooner we know the facts, and know them accurately and officially, the sooner will we be able to apply the remedy. It seems to me the resolution ought to pass without a dissenting vote. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there was an original House resolution, No. 767, on this same subject practically, making a charge directly against the International Harvester Co. I made inquiry of the International Harvester Co. with reference to the facts in the matter when the original resolution, No. 767, was reported. This resolution relates to the same matter, although making no special charge against the International Harvester Co. I have no objection to its passage, nor would I have now to the passage of the original resolution, so far as they are concerned.

I ask to have read in my time a letter from the International Harvester Co. in reference to the matter, and, Mr. Speaker, I ask in reading the letter that the table of figures be omitted from the reading, but inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

Following is the letter referred to:

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL MANAGER,
Chicago, February 7, 1913.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: On my return from California my attention has been directed to a copy of House resolution No. 767, relating to the exemption of American importers from the payment of the export duty on manila hemp. The resolution requests certain information of the President, and asks him to what extent the rebate of duty has operated unjustly and "who have been the beneficiaries of such injustice." I note, too, that the resolution as originally introduced practically charged the International Harvester Co. with being the principal beneficiary under the act and that the refund of the export duty amounted to a free gift or subsidy.

As a manufacturer of twine, the International Harvester Co. has no interest whatever in either the repeal, modification, or continuance of this refunding of the export duty on manila hemp. Our price quotations on binder twine which we manufacture from this manila hemp are based on the net cost of the fiber, and the rebate is always deducted from that cost the same as any other discount. This being the basis of our cost calculations, our customers, the consumers, secure the benefit of the refund. The wholesale prices of binder twine f. o. b. factory and here quoted covering 10 years are official and are taken from the Cordage Trade Journal:

1902	11	11	12½	13½	15
1903	10½	10½	11½	12	13
1904	10½	10½	11½	12½	13½
1905	10	10	11	12	13½
1906	10	10	11	12	13
1907	9½	9½	.....	12½	14
1908	8½	8½	.....	11½	13
1909	7½	7½	.....	8½	10
1910	7½	7½	7¼	8½	9
1911	6½	6½	.....	7¼	8¼

The prices above quoted for 1902 are based on raw material purchased in 1901, before the act went into effect. Note the drop in 1903, when the first manila purchased under the act entered into the trade.

The original act on this subject was passed November 15, 1901, prior to the formation of this company. It levied an export duty on manila hemp of 75 cents per 100 kilos, or about three-eighths of a cent per pound. This payment was credited up to the exporter by the Manila customs upon the shipment of the fiber. Fiber that went direct to the United States in one vessel and which was consumed in the United States was entitled to the above rebate. It applies to all American users, including the seven State prisons that are manufacturing twine. The operation of the law has served to increase the importance of New York as a market for manila fiber and has reduced the price to the American twine consumer.

In spite of the alleged advantages of this rebate the company's use of manila fiber has steadily decreased since 1902. In 1903 we purchased 89,000 bales, or 8.87 per cent of the total amount exported. In 1911 we purchased 67,000 bales, or 4.56 per cent of the total.

The raw materials from which binder twine is manufactured—sisal from Yucatan and manila from the Philippines—are the only raw materials this company consumes that are produced wholly outside of the United States. Prices and production of these are entirely in stranger hands and the material is bought in a fluctuating market. This is a condition which this company earnestly sought to cure.

The straw from American-grown flax is a waste product. It seemed to possess the essential characteristics necessary for a binder twine. If it could be utilized for that purpose, $20,000,000 per annum might be kept at home and paid to the American farmer for this waste product, and the price of binder twine could be materially reduced. In spite of this "free gift or subsidy" this company made every effort to cure this condition and has spent the sum of $1,000,000 in experimental work in this vain quest. A twine was produced, but no commercial process could be found by chemists or laboratory experts that would render the twine free from the attacks of insects.

This letter is sent you for the purpose of clearly defining this company's position. We have steadily declined to participate on one side or the other of this controversy. The continuance of the rebate is, as I have said, of no financial advantage to the International Harvester Co., except in so far as it may benefit our patrons, the farmers, nor do I believe that it has been of any financial advantage to any American cordage company in its domestic trade.

Yours, very truly,

C. S. FUNK,
General Manager.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman proposes to enter into a debate I shall insist upon my point of no quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is to be no debate, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just wants to make a short statement. I do not want to debate the matter.

Mr. MANN. It appears in this letter that in part, owing to the rebate on manila hemp, the price of binding twine in this country has decreased from 13 cents a pound 10 or 12 years ago to the neighborhood of 6 or 7 or 8 cents a pound at the present time, a decrease to go wholly to the benefit of the consumer of binding twine. Probably it is the strongest argument we have yet seen in reference to free trade in raw materials.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 3.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 0, answered "present" 13, not voting 155, as follows:

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The Speaker does not believe that a majority of the Members of the House realize in what a serious condition the business of this House is. Not more than half the appropriation bills have passed the House. In the very nature of things they have to be passed long enough before the 4th of March to get them over to the Senate, let the Senate consider them, and then go through with the conference reports. If you will count out the days that are segregated, so to speak, Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays for particular classes of business, there are only about 11 days of this session left which, in the natural order of things, can be devoted to appropriation bills, with half the appropriation bills still on the hooks. The Chair does not want to see these appropriation bills go over to the extraordinary session of Congress; neither does any other Member. The only way to get these bills through—and the Chair hates to say a word about it at all, because somebody will make the claim that he is trying to set up as a boss, but it is the duty of the Chair to state it—is for Members to stay in their places in this House.

Another thing. While nobody wants to curtail the right of debate in the House, we can not get these bills through if every Members persists in trying to relieve his mind of all the thoughts he has. [Applause.] The Chair sat here this morning and watched at least 25 Members who rushed in and answered to their names, rushed out again, without even stopping to take their overcoats off. They simply answered to their names and rushed right out and back over to their offices again. [Applause.] The Chair is not criticizing these gentlemen. He is not complaining of them. They are all busily engaged in transacting some species of the public business over in their offices, and the Chair recognizes as fully as it is possible for any human being to recognize the tremendous pressure of letter writing at this particular juncture, especially upon the Democratic Members of the House. [Laughter.] But here we have wasted 30 minutes this morning in a roll call. We might just as well have begun at 11 o'clock instead of half past 10.

At any time any gentleman has the constitutional right to raise the point of no quorum. Some Members think the Chair ought to look around and count a quorum without reference to the number present. The Chair is not going to do anything of the sort. He is not going to rule contrary to the evidence and his own senses, and he has pretty good eyes, too. [Laughter.] To have a quorum is a constitutional right, and if gentlemen do not want the business delayed, if they do not want to be criticized for these appropriation bills going over to the next session they must stay here, not only when they have been brought here after a waste of 30 minutes in a call of the House, but they must sit down and stay. Time and time again the Chair has seen the gentlemen managing these appropriation bills give way and yield to let in an amendment, taking money out of the Treasury which they knew ought not to go in and was not in order, simply because they looked around and saw no quorum present and did not want to waste the time to get a quorum.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUGHES of Georgia, for three weeks, on account of official business, inspecting fortifications at Panama.

To Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WARBURTON, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROWN, for one week, on account of death in family.

To Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, for four days, on account of important business.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 28186, an act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and sevice, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield a minute to me?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I would like to congratulate the able gentleman from Kentucky on being able to get one appropriation bill finally passed through both Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair congratulates him, too.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a very carefully prepared article on the workmen's compensation act, prepared by the State Historical Society of Iowa.

Mr. HARDWICK. I object.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 8035) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was printed in the RECORD on Saturday, February 8.

The conference report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1483).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 8035) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the House insert:

"The name of Thomas M. F. Delaney, late of Company G, Fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the House insert:

"The name of John J. Ledford, late of Company F, Fourth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the House insert:

"The name of John F. Burton, late of Company B, Fifth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the House insert:

"The name of Carl W. Carlson, late of Company B, Third Regiment United States Volunteer Cavalry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

And the House agree to the same.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

Amendment No. 1, the case of Arthur F. Shepard, S. 2465: In this case the item was stricken from the bill by the House on the ground that the soldier's condition is not due to service, the principal disability having come on later. The Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 2, the case of Thomas M. F. Delaney, S. 4691: The Senate passed this bill, increasing the pension to $24 per month. The House struck the item from the bill on the ground that it is an excessive rate. Your conferees recommend that the item be restored at $12 per month.

Amendment No. 3, the case of George G. Thirlby, S. 6276: The Senate passed this at $24 per month. The House reduced the rate to $16 per month and the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment.

Amendment No. 4, John L. Ledford, S. 6898: The Senate passed this at $24 per month. The House struck the item from the bill on the ground that the evidence of injury incurred in the service did not warrant such a high rating. The man is badly disabled, and your conferees recommend that the item be restored to the bill at a rate of $16 per month.

Amendment No. 5, John F. Burton, S. 7036: The Senate passed this at $16 per month. The House struck the item from the bill on the ground that the disability did not warrant that rate. Your conferees recommend that the item be restored at a rate of $12 per month, as part of the disability is due to service and the soldier is now receivng a pension of $6.

Amendment No. 6, Otto Weber, S. 7368: The Senate passed this at $16 per month. The House struck the item from the bill on the ground that if soldier's disability had increased he should apply at the bureau. He has not applied for increase for nearly six years. The Senate recedes from its disagreement.

Amendment No. 7, Carl W. Carlson, S. 7466: The soldier is pensioned now at $10 per month. The Senate passed the bill to increase it to $20 per month. The House struck the item from the bill on the ground that if pensionable disability had increased the soldier should be able to get relief at the bureau. The soldier is badly disabled, and your conferees recommend that the item be restored at a rate of $16 per month.

CONTRACTS FOR TRANSFERRING FOREIGN MAIL.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House resolution 778, directing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to institute and carry forward an investigation into the letting of contracts, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. TUTTLE. It is not technically privileged, but I ask unanimous consent to take it up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not permitted under the rule to put that question. The Chair thinks it is better to maintain the rule except where there is an extraordinary situation.

Mr. TUTTLE. I think this is an extraordinary case.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object; it has no business to come before the House now.

The SPEAKER. That is absolutely true. This is District of Columbia day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 22643, to amend subchapter 2, chapter 19 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, by providing a penalty for willful omission to return library property in the District of Columbia, and I ask to substitute therefor Senate bill 6096.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the District of Columbia from further consideration of the bill S. 6096 and substitute it for the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the House bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subchapter 2, of chapter 19, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by adding thereto an additional section, to be known as section 849 a, as follows:

"SEC. 849 a. Whoever willfully detains any book, newspaper, magazine, pamphlet, manuscript, or other property belonging to or in the custody or control of the Library of Congress, or any public or incorporated library in the District of Columbia, for 30 days after notice in writing to return the same, such notice to contain a copy of this section, and to be given after the expiration of the time which, by the rules of such library, such book or other property may be kept, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1 nor more than $25, or by imprisonment for not less than one month nor more than six months. Prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the name of the District of Columbia by information filed by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants: Provided, That the penalties provided by this section shall be in addition to any penalties lawfully imposed by the trustees of any public or incorporated library in the District of Columbia, and shall be applicable when the offense is not otherwise punishable by some statute of the United States."

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the bill as it passed the Senate struck out the word "willfully"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; the word "willfully" is in the House bill, but not in the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. If the Senate bill is taken up, what is the gentleman's intention?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no intention; I do not care whether the word is in or out; it is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. MANN. It may not make much difference what the gentleman from Kentucky will do, but it makes considerable difference what the House will do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the Senate bill be taken up, the word "willfully" not being in it, it would pass that way or amended with the insertion of the word "willfully." I would not care to offer the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill, if a Member of Congress has sent to his rooms or to his office a book from the Congressional Library and it is lost, or even if he returns it and they do not find it, and say that he lost it, he is liable to an imprisonment of six months.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I want to object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. It is not a question of the consideration of the bill; it is a question of the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not object to the consideration of the bill. The Chair will state the situation. The engrossed copy of the Senate bill is not here, and, unless the House intends to give unanimous consent to consider it, it is not in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the engrossed copy of the Senate bill is not here we can not consider it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that it has disappeared from the District Committee room, as has a number of other bills.

Mr. MANN. And if this bill were in force as to an engrossed copy of a bill, the gentleman would be liable to a fine and imprisonment because he had lost it, and I am sure that no one in the House would charge the gentleman with negligent or willful loss of the engrossed copy, or anything of the sort. Yet that is what the Senate bill provides with reference to a book coming from the Congressional Library.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I object to the substitution of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a perfect right to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the House bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I withdraw the motion to consider either the House or the Senate bill.

EMBEZZLEMENT OF EVIDENCE OF DEBT—DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 21709) to amend section 851a of chapter 19 of subchapter 2 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be amended by adding to subchapter 2 of chapter 19 the following section:

"SEC. 851a. Whoever shall be guilty of any offense defined in sections 834, 835, 836, 837, and 838 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia shall, where the thing, evidence of debt, property, proceeds or profits be of the value of not more than $35, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or a fine of not more than $500, or both."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill prepared by United States District Attorney Wilson, and upon his recommendation of it the committee has reported it out. I will say, however, that the title to the bill is not correct, and if the bill passes I shall make a motion to amend the title.

Mr. BARTLETT. To what sort of an offense does this section refer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is an addition to section 849, which deals with embezzlement by agent, attorney, clerk, or servant.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it to regulate the punishment with reference to the amount of money embezzled?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the present law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know. This is the creation of additional offenses.

Mr. MANN. The present law provides for a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 10 years, or both, as to embezzlement by agent, attorney, clerk, or servant.

Mr. BARTLETT. That refers to embezzlement without regard to money?

Mr. MANN. No; that is not the law with reference to section 851.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is with reference to the embezzlement of any paper which evidences indebtedness. There is no statute against it, and the district attorney wishes this bill passed. I will read from the bill:

SEC. 851a. Whoever shall be guilty of any offense defined in sections 834, 835, 836, 837, and 838 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia shall, where the thing, evidence of debt, property, proceeds or profits be of the value of not more than $35, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or a fine of not more than $500, or both.

Mr. BARTLETT. Both, then, are made felonies. The embezzlement of $35 under this act is made a felony, as I understand it. It would be imprisonment in the penitentiary for one year, I apprehend, though it does not say so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I thought the House met at 12 o'clock this morning, and I have not had time to run over these bills and be as familiar with them as I would like to be. I am relying largely upon the fact that District Attorney Wilson has prepared this bill and sent it over here.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is no embarrassment to me. I do not care whether the bill passes or not.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman does not think the House ought to be informed as to what the present penalties are before making changes in them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The sections to be amended are:

SEC. 834. Embezzlement by agent, attorney, clerk, or servant: If any agent, attorney, clerk, or servant of a private person or copartnership, or any officer, attorney, agent, clerk, or servant of any association or incorporated company shall wrongfully convert to his own use, or fraudulently take, make away with, or secrete, with intent to convert to his own use, anything of value which shall come into his possession or under his care by virtue of his employment or office, whether the thing so converted be the property of his master or employer or that of any other person, copartnership, association, or corporation, he shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I suggest to the gentleman that the effect of this bill is to reduce the penalty where the amount does not exceed $35? That is the whole purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It clearly states that.

Mr. BARTLETT. So that instead of increasing the penalty or making a new penalty it decreases the penalty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I understand it makes some penalty——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia called attention to what I was going to ask.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill (H. R. 21709) to amend subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia."

AMENDING SUBCHAPTER 2 OF CHAPTER 19, CODE OF LAW FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 21714, a bill to amend section 851b of chapter 19 of subchapter 2 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21714) to amend section 851b of chapter 19 of subchapter 2 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be amended by adding to subchapter 2 of chapter 19 the following section:

"SEC. 851b. That if any person entrusted with the possession of anything of value, including things savoring of the realty, for the purpose of applying the same for the use and benefit of the owner or person so delivering it, shall fraudulently convert the same to his own use he shall, where the value of the thing so converted is $35 or more, be punished by imprisonment for not less than 1 nor more than 10 years, or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both; and where the value of the thing so converted is less than $35 he shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $500, or both: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to alter or repeal the foregoing sections contained in subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of this code."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill (H. R. 21714) to amend subchapter 2 of chapter 19 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia."

INTERMARRIAGE OF WHITES WITH NEGROES OR MONGOLIANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 5948.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5948) to prohibit in the District of Columbia the intermarriage of whites with negroes or Mongolians.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the District of Columbia it shall be unlawful for any person of the Caucasian blood, or their descendants, to intermarry with an African, commonly called negro, or the descendants of an African, or with a Mongolian, or with the descendants of a Mongolian; and should any person as aforesaid violate the provisions of this act such marriage shall be null and void and the parties so offending shall be prosecuted for a felony, and if convicted shall be imprisoned not less than two years nor fined not more than $500, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That any attempt to evade this statute by marrying out of the District of Columbia and returning into it shall be within its meaning, and such marriage shall likewise be null and void, and the offending parties shall be prosecuted as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be of force from its passage.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

On line 4, page 1, strike out the words "blood, or their descendants" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or white race."

On line 5, after the word "with," strike out the rest of the line, all of line 6, and all of line 7, down to and including the word "Mongolian," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "any person of the Ethiopian or black race, Malay or brown race, or Mongolian or yellow race."

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 12.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "To prohibit in the District of Columbia the intermarriage of whites with Ethiopians, Malays, or Mongolians."

WAREHOUSE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 28530 and ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28530) to provide for a warehouse for the receipt, care, and distribution of supplies for the use of the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 47.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky and Mr. MANN took their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 80.

So the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was rejected.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agriculture appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, with Mr. BEALL of Texas in the chair.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to page 17, line 16, of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 17, line 18, by striking out "$375,000" and inserting "$435,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further, I ask that only 20 minutes be used in debate on this proposition, 10 minutes on a side.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, a year ago a substantial increase in this appropriation was made, and the only objection urged against it was that there was doubt as to whether the department was able properly to use the money asked for. When the increase of appropriation was made, the department increased its organization, added to its force, and is now able properly to use the money asked for. In my judgment, no better work is carried on by the department than by the branch of the service called "Farm Management and Farm Demonstration."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the particular work done under so-called farm management and demonstration?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The employment of experts to go out and meet farmers right on the farms, to give them instructions, and assist them in understanding and applying new methods suggested by the department and its experts.

Many years ago substantial assistance was given by the Federal Government to the agricultural colleges of the States, but every law providing money for colleges forbade its use outside of the colleges except for the publication of bulletins or for the holding of institutes where lectures might be given. It has been found that information as to secrets of the soil and new methods of agriculture have not reached the farmer. The bulletins are skillfully drawn, and it would seem as if they might be understood, but the ordinary farmer does not apply them. Gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture urging these appropriations—presidents of agricultural colleges and gentlemen high in the Department of Agriculture—told us that if the work of the Agricultural Department, the secrets they have discovered, the new methods that they could put into operation, could be taken to the farmers of the country in such a way as to be understood and readily applied in their work, agriculture could be revolutionized in this country. The department now is organized so that it can use the amount of money my amendment would provide. I have talked with the officials there.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE]?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not the policy of the Government to use this money in cooperating with the respective States in the Union?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In most of the States work is done by cooperating with the officials of agricultural colleges. It is found that is the best way to carry on this work.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do they not require the county or the community which gets one of these demonstrators to put up a part of the expense?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In almost every case that plan is followed, and the officials of the department tell me there is such a demand for this kind of work—so many ways of cooperation and so many offers of contributions of money—that it is evident that the work so far carried on is successful; it is very popular, and the department needs more money than is now carried in this bill in order to enable it properly to carry on the work. The Secretary of Agriculture has said in my hearing over and over again that he considers this as the most important work that his department is doing.

This work was first carried on largely in the South under another appropriation, "To meet the ravages of the boll weevil." It has been very successful there. The increase of this appropriation would take nothing, of course, from the appropriation available for work in the South and would in no way curtail that or interfere with it. This appropriation would simply extend to the North work similar to that carried on so successfully in the South. It was my privilege a few days ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that it was my privilege a few days ago to visit the South—the city of Columbia, S. C., where the annual corn exposition was held—and while there I learned a little better than I knew before the result of the efforts the Department of Agriculture has made in bringing about better methods of agriculture.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman spoke, if I understood him correctly, about the use of this appropriation to repair the ravages of the boll weevil in the South. I was wondering whether, under the appropriation, they undertook to repair the ravages of the boll weevil in the South before the boll weevil had committed any ravages; and if so, how?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, if I used the word "repair" I used the wrong word.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman understands what I am trying to get at, does he not?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes. There is a feeling that this money is not used exactly to meet the ravages of the boll weevil, but the money is properly used. I make no criticism of the way it has been used, and I believe the appropriation ought to be continued.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do.

Mr. COX. Do not the hearings before the gentleman's committee disclose the fact that up to this hour they have been unable to find anything that would meet the ravages of the boll weevil?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Not exactly that. The testimony before the committee is to the effect that they have no way of exterminating the boll weevil. This, however, is not the boll-weevil appropriation. I was diverted by the question of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me in that connection to make an answer for him?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state that——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I object to the gentleman making a statement in my time. I thought at first he wanted simply to ask a question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I may be misinformed about this, and I should be inclined to think that the practice is all right if it actually exists, but I understand the practice is to anticipate the effect of the boll weevil by farm instruction in territory far in advance of its appearance there, and that much of the work is in anticipation of what the boll weevil might do if it should arrive.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It is in anticipation, Mr. Chairman; but the boll weevil's progress has not been stopped in any respect or in any measure. Its march is steady, and it is absolutely necessary for the people of the Southern States, where cotton is grown or has been grown exclusively, to learn some other lines of agriculture, and it is in the effort to teach those people and induce them to engage in other lines so as to overcome the effect of the boll weevil or be able to meet it when it comes that this money is used, and it is properly used.

But I do not wish to be diverted into talk of the boll-weevil appropriation. I make no criticism of it. Instead of criticizing it, I am in favor of it. I have never questioned the propriety of making that appropriation. I have sometimes questioned the language that was used, but never the amount of money appropriated or the use made of it.

I was attracted by the wonderful results produced by the agents of the Department of Agriculture with the boll-weevil money, and have wished to see that work carried on in the North. It is begun. The department is organized. It is doing splendid work. Requests are coming from every State in the North, and I might say from almost every county, with offers of money for cooperation. The department can use every dollar of this amount, $435,000, and use it profitably in its work, and my amendment would appropriate that amount. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, the department asked for $407,000 for this work. We carefully considered it, and, in the judgment of the committee, the $375,000 that we have allowed is amply sufficient to carry on this demonstration work in the part of the country designated for it. In all frankness, candor, and earnestness, I am very much surprised that this motion should come from a member of the committee who was himself on the subcommittee and agreed to this and then in the full committee ratified it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. For a question.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is it not true that I moved to make this $435,000, and that I used every effort in that committee to induce them to accept that amendment?

Mr. LAMB. I do not recall it. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman's memory is not as good as it ought to be.

Mr. LAMB. I thought it was a peculiar position for a member of the committee to take after we had discussed this matter in the subcommittee and in the full committee. We think the $375,000 that we allow is ample to carry on this work. We gave exactly the same amount that you will find in the paragraph below for the demonstration work in the Southern States, supposed to be for the eradication of the boll weevil. That money is used, of course, for just the same purposes that this is. We feel that this amount is all that they can use properly and with good judgment, and we hope the Committee of the Whole will stand by the Committee on Agriculture in the matter of this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the Lever bill, which is now in conference, becomes a law at this session of Congress, will it not provide a considerable sum for this same work in addition to the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; it will carry an appropriation for the agricultural colleges that will do the same work.

Mr. MANN. I understand the theory of the Lever bill is to carry on extension work.

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. You provide in the Lever bill an appropriation the first year of $300,000 or $400,000, anyhow.

Mr. LEVER. We provide for $480,000.

Mr. MANN. Four hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the first year?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Practically to do this same class of work, as I understand.

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does not the Lever bill contain a clause providing that the appropriation thereby made shall not in any respect interfere with farm-demonstration work or farm-management work?

Mr. LAMB. I think that is correct.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. First, I desire to call attention to a statement which was made before the committee in relation to the purposes of this appropriation. I asked this question of Dr. Galloway:

> Is there any part of this six hundred and some odd thousand dollars that is available under farm-management work and the farmers' cooperative work that is now being actually expended for original scientific work by experts in the department looking toward the improvement of any of the great farm products and a solution of any of the purely scientific phases of agricultural work?
> The CHAIRMAN. None whatever?
> Dr. GALLOWAY. No, sir.

So that the appropriation of this money does not in any manner advance the position of agricultural science or help to solve the great problems confronting the farmers in their efforts to feed and clothe our Nation.

I have here a statement of how this $300,000 is expended for the current year. Of the total sum only $171,291 was allotted for farm demonstration work. Now, this amendment proposes to increase the appropriation more than $100,000, ostensibly to stimulate farm demonstration work. Yet of the $300,000 carried in current law there was but $171,291 allotted for farm-demonstration work. There was $55,980 spent on the study of farm economics, cost account, farm management surveys, history of farm management, marketing farm products, farm equipment, and farm credits. The subject of farm credits means a study of the European system of farm credits, which has absolutely no relation to the development of agricultural science or to the germane work of the Agricultural Department.

There was $37,161 appropriated for the study of tenant farming in relation to farm management, making and utilization of hay, sugar-beet growing, and so forth. The full list of these subjects is as follows:

NOTE.—Project No. 313-A consisted originally of the North Central and the North Atlantic States. It has been found advisable to divide this into the North Central and the North Atlantic, making a new project number of the latter, the number to be decided by the project committee. Mr. L. A. Clinton is in charge; salary, $3,000.

Thus the department did not seek to use the sum of $300,000 for farm demonstration work, but used only $171,291 for this purpose. Then why seek to make this very large increase?

This work has been advanced so rapidly by large appropriations that the department could not get from the civil service enough persons to fill the positions so as to organize this work within the classified service, but appointed persons without examination. It is not good policy to command the department to extend scientific work more rapidly than a corps of teachers can be organized under usual methods and to increase the number of employees when competency is not guaranteed. I will put in the RECORD a statement showing every person appointed under this appropriation, which will indicate those secured under civil service and those appointed without such examination. It will be observed that 82 of such persons were not taken from the classified list.

Furthermore, I will insert in the RECORD the number of communities which are profiting by this work. Under the plan of the Department of Agriculture 25 per cent of the total expense of this demonstration work is to be contributed by the National Government, 25 per cent by the State experiment station, and 50 per cent by the localities to be benefited. In Vermont there were only four counties that contributed, and thus inaugurated this work in their communities. There is scarcely a State in the Union where a half dozen counties cooperated with the National Government. It will require time to develop this complex cooperation between the department, the State experiment station, and the community. This amendment is a proposition to appropriate money where the communities have not had sufficient time to become interested enough to take up their part of the work or to provide funds to meet their pro rata of expense.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The question is new, or was a year ago, and I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that just now in nearly every weekly paper which I have received I see that the farmers have organized in the several communities for the purpose of having demonstrated to them the value of the expert farmer.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. In answer to that I will take my own State for an illustration. We have there farm demonstration work organized as well as in any State in the Union. We have a thousand organizations for farm demonstration work, and yet in the State of Indiana only 4 counties out of 92 contributed money to inaugurate this work and thereby participate in this appropriation. The new work of the department ought to be carefully estimated for and considered before Congress appropriates public funds. Any other course is not only extravagant, but it will surely result in waste of public moneys. During the last five years Congress has forced appropriations on the Department of Agriculture. In many items their estimates have been reduced, while in many other directions the appropriations have been largely increased without any consultation with the heads of departments. I will insert the following extracts from the hearings and table showing the increase each year of the appropriation over the estimate. It will be observed that in 1913 the per cent of increase not estimated for was 116.

The CHAIRMAN. So that sometimes there does not come any estimate either from the chief of the bureau or the Department of Agriculture? For instance, at times, through the action of the House, Congress takes the initiative in that matter?

Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that, speaking generally, 60 per cent of our increases are not estimated for at all.

If their fitness as outlined by the department is approved by the commission, their appointments are made permanent under Schedule A of the civil-service rules respecting positions excepted from examination. In the case of the farm architect and the scientific assistant in tenant farming, prior authority for their appointment was obtained from the Civil Service Commission, there being no eligibles for such positions on the civil-service lists at the time their services were needed.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have you place in the record the States and the number of centers in each State where the work has been inaugurated without any contributions of local funds; then the States and the centers in each that have contributed one-fourth; the States and centers in each that have contributed one-half; and the States and the centers in each that have contributed one-third.

FARM MANAGEMENT, FIELD STUDIES, AND DEMONSTRATIONS.

In all the counties in which this work has been inaugurated the local organizations and the States are contributing one-half or more, with but three or four exceptions. One of these is Bedford County, Pa., which was started three years ago, where the bureau is contributing all but $100 of the expense. Another county is Wahkiakum County, Wash., where the bureau is contributing $960 and the county $500 as well as office room. In Mercer County, Pa., the bureau is paying practically all of the cost of the work. The following statement indicates the present condition of the work (Jan. 21, 1913). Much of the work has not yet been definitely arranged.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like the committee to understand what we are doing. Last year we increased the appropriation in this item $156,000. This is the first year that this particular division of the Bureau of Plant Industry has been doing this work. The Secretary of Agriculture recommended in his estimate an appropriation of $435,000 for the next fiscal year. The committee allowed $75,000 of that amount. We did it in the belief that they could not economically and wisely in the second year of their work expend $435,000. We felt that a $75,000 increase and a total appropriation of $375,000 for a work only two years old, good as it is, was a liberal appropriation and ought to be considered as a liberal appropriation of the whole committee for this work. I sincerely trust that the gentlemen on this side, at least, will not be frightened into voting for this increase of $60,000 asked by the gentleman from Michigan on the theory that a vote against it will be considered a vote against the farmer. I want to say to you that the farmer is a sensible fellow and he wants his business carried on in a sensible way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been exhausted, but the gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be agreed to. I want to call attention to one or two facts in connection therewith. As has been correctly stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, the appropriation was increased last year, and I tried to show in some remarks I made in general debate when this bill first came up that under that appropriation the Bureau of Farm Management was doing a splendid work. It is hampered because it does not have sufficient funds. The gentleman from Indiana stated, as I understood him, that 116 per cent of the increases in the agricultural bill had been made last year where they were not asked for. I do not quite understand his arithmetic, but be that as it may, the fact is the department is straining every nerve to get these men to the different localities that are seeking to get their services, but it is hampered because it does not have sufficient funds, and so it is asking for this increased appropriation of $435,000, for the benefit of the farmers of the North and West.

Gentlemen say this simply puts it on a parity with the appropriation for the boll-weevil work or cooperative demonstration work in the South. I am entirely in favor of that appropriation. The Knapp work is splendid work and has accomplished great good, but I am here in the name of the farmers of the great North and West asking that you give us the same advantages that you have been giving the farmers of the South ever since 1904.

Mr. LAMB. Let me say to the gentleman that we are doing that now.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is quite correct. The fact is this appropriation for Knapp work in the South has been in the bill since 1904, and the farm-management work we are trying to get established for the benefit of the farmers of the North and West is a new thing. This appropriation would offset the Knapp work appropriation these many years back, and we need this money to bring up the farm-management work to a standard and parity with the cooperative demonstration work in the South. This is a fair amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "$435,000" and inserting "$400,000."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, this strikes out $435,000, as offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and inserts $400,000, which would be a reduction of $35,000 and an increase of $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCLAUGHLIN) there were—ayes 38, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that we have not yet read the next paragraph or the next item, on page 17, which was passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, and the Clerk will read that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, $375,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all beginning with the word "and," in line 22, down to and including the word "weevil," in line 24, so that the paragraph will read:

"For farmers' cooperative demonstrations, $375,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri the following change in the language. Make the paragraph read:

For farmers' cooperative demonstration work, $375,000.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer that as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment so that it will read:
"For farmers' cooperative demonstration work, $375,000."

Mr. LEVER. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question? This amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri and accepted by the committee is not intended to do away with the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the boll weevil? That work is not to be discontinued or abated?

Mr. LEVER. Not at all. The idea of the committee in accepting the amendment is that the work is really demonstration work, and it ought more properly be called demonstration work.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is the understanding of the committee that striking out these lines in no way abridges the authority of the Agricultural Department to continue this work—enlarge or decrease it as the good of the country may demand.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question. Does the Chair understand the gentleman's amendment to be to strike out the word "demonstrations" and insert "demonstration work"?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] asked what would be the effect of this, and my friend from South Carolina says that after you strike this language out it means the same that it does before it is stricken out.

But that is not a proper construction. If this language is stricken out of the bill the department is no longer given authority to study the best method of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil. There must be no other object on the part of the gentleman from Missouri in striking the language out except to strike out that authority. Now, when the department reads the language after it is out they read only authority for farmers' cooperative demonstration work, and, if then they turn from the language of the appropriation bill to the proceedings in the House, they find that the House has stricken out of the bill that part of it which authorizes the department to study the best method of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil, and no department of the Government would be warranted under such conditions in continuing that study, so what is the object in striking it out?

Mr. BOOHER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman desired to ask a question.

Mr. BOOHER. No; I thought the gentleman had finished. Mr. Chairman, my object in introducing this amendment was simply to place this sum of money in the hands of the department to use where it pleases in this work. Now, you turn to the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, and you will find that the department expert said in the hearings that they only used $10,000 last year of the sum of money that was appropriated for the study of the boll weevil, and they had come to the conclusion now, and it is a settled fact with the department, that there is no cure for boll weevil except the early planting of cotton and intensified farming, and it is demonstration work along that line entirely that this amendment is offered that it may be so used. Now, let us see what the testimony was.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If out of the appropriations of last year they only used $10,000 for farmers' cooperative demonstration work the gentleman does not fear they have got authority to use all they want of that——

Mr. BOOHER. No; I think whenever an appropriation is made the department will use any sum they have; we never see them turning any of it back. The appropriation last year was $332,960 for this purpose, and only $10,000 was used to eradicate the boll weevil. Not a cent of the balance was turned back to the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. They can use all they want out of this appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. BOOHER. Here is the testimony, and now let us see. Dr. Howard was on the stand, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN asked him this question:

Have you considered the advisability of stopping your work and using the appropriation given Dr. Knapp in assisting the farmers?
Dr. HOWARD. That has been suggested, but we are spending only about $10,000 on the weevil.

Mr. LAMB. Now, the gentleman is getting the wrong horse.

Mr. BOOHER. No, I am not. I am reading from the testimony before the gentleman's committee, and the gentleman was present at the hearing.

Mr. LAMB. Dr. Howard is chief of the Bureau of Entomology.

Mr. BOOHER. But this whole question of the boll weevil is divided——

Mr. LAMB. They get $45,000 for this work.

Mr. BOOHER. You have three paragraphs under which the study of the boll weevil can be continued without this large sum.

Mr. LAMB. That is right.

Mr. BOOHER. So this amendment is simply taking the boll-weevil provision out of this bill and permitting the use of the sum appropriated to be used in farmers' cooperative demonstration work. I want to read a little further from the hearings to show the House that the department has absolutely quit trying to kill and destroy the boll weevil:

Mr. HAWLEY. Have you given up the problem of attempting to find a spray that will kill the boll weevil?
Dr. HOWARD. Practically so.
Mr. HAWLEY. You think it will not be possible to kill it with a spray?
Dr. HOWARD. No, sir.

What is the use of continuing? Why spend large sums of money and accomplish nothing? You have got three paragraphs carrying over $84,000 in this bill already adopted that gives this department the right to pursue the study of the boll weevil, and you have increased this item something like $60,000 over last year. I want the department to have all the money they need, but I do not want this Committee of the Whole House to vote any money under false pretenses of this boll-weevil business, because they tell you they can not kill it. They tell you that the only thing that the farmer can do to wipe out the boll weevil is by changing crops and planting cotton earlier. You do not need any outside demonstration work to teach the farmers that; treat the farmers like men, not as a lot of children.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman claims they have authority under other sections of the bill if they desire to do this?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly. If they want to pursue the study of boll weevil, or any other thing that attacks crops in the South, they have the right to do it under three paragraphs we have already adopted which carry $84,000 for that purpose. I think that language ought to go out.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a vote.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I would like to be heard briefly.

Mr. BOOHER. Just a moment. I want to call the attention of my friends from the cotton-growing regions to Bulletin 519 of the Department of Agriculture. It gives the experience of an old negro cotton raiser in the South. It shows that, without any assistance from anybody, without a word from a department expert, without anybody to show him anything—and I understand he is in the district of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]—that old negro, named Sam McCall, took an old, run-down piece of land, where you could not raise more than two or three hundred pounds of cotton to the acre, and worked it until now he raises from three to five bales to the acre.

Mr. LAMB. He has been educated in the best of schools—the school of experience.

Mr. BOOHER. What a negro cotton raiser can do a white cotton raiser in the South can do, I imagine. I want to recommend to my friends from the cotton-growing regions that they get a number of those bulletins and send them to every cotton raiser in their districts.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I infer from what the gentleman says that this old darkey has found out more about growing cotton than the department experts have.

Mr. BOOHER. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Why not hire him?

Mr. BOOHER. I am going to ask unanimous consent to print this bulletin in the RECORD. It is written entirely on the experience of this man. It is illustrated. I am going to ask that it be put in the RECORD, illustrations and all, in order that the readers of the RECORD may see just what has been done.

Mr. LAMB. If you put it in the RECORD, they will never see it. The bulletin is the place for it.

Mr. SIMS. Does the bulletin say that he raised from three to five bales of cotton on an acre?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] ask unanimous consent to print a farmers' bulletin in the RECORD or not?

Mr. BOOHER. I want to make the request to print it in the RECORD, with the illustrations.

Mr. MANN. I shall object.

Mr. BOOHER. I make the request now.

Mr. MANN. I object to printing public documents in the RECORD.

Mr. BOOHER. I am very sorry the gentleman objected. The bulletin, if read by the cotton raisers, would save to the Government the large sums we appropriate every year under the pretense that it is in aid of the farmer and the planter.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, permit me to call the committee's attention to the language of the paragraph which my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] seeks to amend:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil, $375,000.

Now, under the language of the paragraph it is not incumbent on the department to expend all of the $375,000 for studying or checking the ravages of the boll weevel, but only so much of it as they see fit. Under the first clause of the paragraph, "for farmers' cooperative demonstrations," they may expend such amount as in their judgment is proper for other demonstrations.

Mr. LEVER. Will my friend withhold for a moment? The language in this item means this, that on account of the criticism, such as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] offers and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] has so often offered in the committee, as to the character of the work being done under the language in the item, which used to read:

For the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

It was decided in conference last year to add:

For farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton boll weevil.

Now, I am confident in my own mind that the department, under the language proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] and amended by my amendment, "for farmers' cooperative demonstration work," will have all the authority it wants to use that money in the best way they can for the benefit of the work. And if to do farmers' cooperative demonstration work, combating the boll weevil is considered by the department the best use of this money, they will expend it in that way.

Mr. RODDENBERY. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] well knows the significance of the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if "striking out" this amendment should be adopted, because the vote of the House will show, in the face of his statement, that the item authorizing study and work for meeting the ravages of the boll weevil was stricken out. I fear this will leave the department stripped of authority to continue this work. I know my friend from South Carolina does not desire that result to follow.

Now, if that is the purpose of my colleague from Missouri, not to discontinue this boll-weevil investigation and work, why not accept this substitute, "For farmers' cooperative demonstration work," and so forth?

Provided, That the department may expend so much of this sum as it sees fit for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil.

Now, although the department has exerted its highest endeavors faithfully, I am not infatuated with the success that it has had in effecting an eradication of the cotton-boll weevil, nor am I especially out of accord with some of the views of my colleague from Missouri. But in my judgment this change should not be made—and I hope gentlemen will take note of the significance of it—without at least letting the paragraph carry some clause that will negative the idea that the department no longer has authority to do this work if it sees fit.

Now, look at the paragraph just before, carrying $375,000: "Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated" a certain sum may be used in a certain way.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Georgia that I have absolutely no objection to his substitute. The only reason the committee accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] was that by accepting it we would be enabled to go on and gain time, believing that it would not affect the work of the department. But I am willing to accept the gentleman's substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference between "farm demonstration work" in the preceding item and "farmers' cooperative demonstrations" as carried in this item?

Mr. LEVER. In practice, none.

Mr. MANN. But the department must assume a difference. They otherwise would have to assume that Congress is childish.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I take no issue with the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] is needlessly excited, it seems to me, about the productivity of an acre or two of ground in my district. There we sometimes produce a bale of cotton on 1 acre of ground in my district, and this old negro man McCall that he has referred to was taught by his master how to produce cotton. He was a slave, and his master taught him how to produce cotton on a large scale. It is said, I believe, that he remained on the old plantation after the emancipation and raised cotton on the same ground that he raised it on when his master was alive.

Mr. BOOHER. No; not on that land at all. He bought another farm.

Mr. HEFLIN. But the secret of his success is the fact that he has employed the very methods taught by the bulletins distributed by Members of Congress. I have sent these bulletins into my district for eight years. Here is what this bulletin says, speaking of this old negro:

During the last few years, having heard something of the advantages of crop rotation as a means of increasing the yield, McCall has been diversifying his crops, making corn and oats in addition to cotton, hoping in this way to refresh his land and to increase the productiveness of his land so as to enable him to produce the standard nine bales of cotton on 1 acre.

He has been doing the very thing that the Department of Agriculture has been teaching—the diversification of crops.

Therein lies the secret. He does not have to read the bulletins himself. I doubt whether he can read. But he sees and talks with farmers cultivating their ground around him, who do read the bulletins, and he hears it from them. That is why this negro produced so much on this 1 or 2 acres of ground. He has not and will not ever produce nine bales of cotton on 1 acre of ground.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is all very interesting, it is true, but I ask for a vote.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman's time has not expired.

Mr. LAMB. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was through.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman said that the success of this old negro was due to the fact that he had studied in the school of cotton experience under his master. Now, I want to know why his surviving master or the children of his master, who may also be assumed to have studied in the same school, can not go on with the same measure of success that the old negro has had?

Mr. HEFLIN. The character of the soil has a great deal to do with it. Soil of one character will produce a great deal more cotton than soil of another character.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is glory enough for all. Why not give that old man his share of it?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is what I want him to have. I simply want to show that this old negro learned from the farmers around him who do read the bulletins.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; but the farmers around him have not been intelligent enough to know what he knows.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama if the territory invaded by the boll weevil is not constantly increasing?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Has it not reached the gentleman's own State?

Mr. HEFLIN. It has.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And this demonstration work is necessary for that reason.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true. The boll weevil has now reached my State and the State of Georgia.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that all debate on this paragraph and the amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, in reply to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] I want to say that he read from the bulletin the experience of this old colored man after he had been raising from 3 to 5 bales of cotton to the acre. He did not state where the old man got his information in the first place or the condition his land was in when he began. Let me read that to you. Here is what he said. Here is what Dr. Galloway says he did:

McCall began working such portions of his land as were tillable and grew cotton and corn, the crops common to that section. After working along this line for 15 years he arrived at the conclusion that a man with a limited equipment who was doing practically all his own work could obtain better results by concentrating his efforts on a small area of land.

No one gave McCall instructions about cultivating his land—no expert to tell him how to proceed. It is not a fact that anyone ever read him a bulletin or gave him advice. How did he know anything about it? He dug it out of his own head, went to work and improved his land so that it has become very productive.

He accordingly selected 2 acres near his cabin and for the last 21 years has devoted his time and energies to increasing the producing capacity of his small area. These 2 acres were in a little higher state of fertility than the other tillable portions of his land, producing on an average one-third to one-fifth of a bale of cotton to the acre.

Now, without anybody ever reading to him a bulletin, without anybody telling him how to kill the boll weevil, he raises from 3 to 5 bales to the acre. Why, the cotton-boll weevil has been a blessing to the cotton raiser. That may sound strange, but you raise more cotton every year as the years come and go, and if it was not for the cotton-boll weevil you would raise such a tremendous crop that, if our theory of prices is right, the supply would far exceed the demand, and the price of cotton would go down to a place where you could not afford to raise it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to correct the gentleman. The cotton crop of 1911 was more than 2,000,000 bales greater than the crop of 1912.

Mr. BOOHER. Either the gentleman is mistaken or else the bureau reports are wrong—one or the other.

Mr. HEFLIN. The department does not claim that the crop of 1912 is within 2,000,000 bales as great as the crop of 1911.

Mr. BOOHER. This Congress has appropriated for killing the boll weevil two million and a quarter dollars, and I will put into the RECORD a letter giving the amount for each year that you have been appropriating for the eradication of the boll weevil, only to learn there is no remedy:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 17, 1912.

Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BOOHER: In compliance with your letter, I have the honor to advise you that the following sums have been appropriated for the suppression of the boll weevil in the cotton States, viz:

Fiscal year:
1905	$250,000
1906	100,000
1907	250,000
1908	150,000
1909	144,000
1910	225,000
1911	250,115
1912	350,000
1913	352,000
Total	2,123,115

In connection with the above figures, Congress made specific appropriations for "Cotton-boll weevil investigations" for the fiscal years 1905 to 1908, inclusive. For the years 1909 to 1913, inclusive, the amounts represented were appropriated for farmers' cooperative demonstrations and for the study and demonstration of the best methods of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

During this time the crop of cotton had increased from year to year. There may have been one year when there was less raised, just as has happened to the corn crop and the wheat crop and other crops. But it is true that they continue to raise greater and greater crops in spite of the tremendous ravages of the boll weevil. The boll weevil, like other farm pests, come and go, and after we have so generously appropriated money to eradicate them, and the experts tell us that there is no known remedy that will destroy the pest, it occurs to me that we are not justified in spending this large sum, $375,000, in further prosecution of these useless experiments. Let us be generous in furnishing money for farm-demonstration work, but not for a special purpose, when it has been demonstrated that further expenditure along that line will be productive of no good results.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to make an appropriation to send some Agricultural Department experts to study the methods used by this old colored man?

Mr. BOOHER. I think it would. They absolutely go on in this bulletin and say that this old fellow raises such a class of cotton seed, that is known as McCall's cotton seed, and brings a large price in the market; this, too, without the aid of an expert or an appropriation.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman from Missouri seen statements that somebody raised 300 bushels of corn to the acre?

Mr. BOOHER. I have heard a gentleman say that he saw an acre of corn that yielded 300 bushels to the acre, and I think he told the truth; I think that can be done.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman mean to say that you can pile 9 bales of cotton on an acre of land and leave any room for the stalks?

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, the old man says he is going to raise that amount before he dies, and if he succeeds as well in the future as he has in the past no doubt he will do so.

Mr. HARDY. My capacity for accepting statements of that sort is limited.

Mr. BOOHER. I am not responsible for the gentleman's limited capacity?

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman state how much he did make on 1 acre of ground?

Mr. BOOHER. Three to five bales, weighing 505, 506, and 510 pounds, on 1 acre, 50 bushels of oats and 50 bushels of corn and 1 bale of cotton on the other acre.

Mr. HARDY. That is altogether out of proportion.

Mr. BOOHER. I have nothing to do with the proportion; I am telling you what is in the bulletin. It came under the observation of the expert who wrote it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I think the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the subcommittee will accept.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri? The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOR FARMERS' DEMONSTRATION WORK.

Provided, That of the amount hereby appropriated such sum may be used for the study and demonstration of the best method of meeting the ravages of the cotton-boll weevil as may be deemed necessary, $375,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Is not that a substitute for the paragraph? Does not the amendment to the paragraph come first?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia stated that it was a substitute for the amendment as proposed to be amended, but it appears to the Chair that it is a substitute for the paragraph. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RODDENBERY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. After a vote is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, will my amendment be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia as a substitute will be in order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is voted down, will a vote then be taken on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his amendment to the amendment was defeated.

Mr. LEVER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is voted down, then the language of the bill will stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has a substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw that, we can go on with the language in the bill for the farmers' cooperative demonstration work, $375,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOOHER) there were 19 ayes and 45 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the substitute which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment in the way of a substitute. Is there objection?

Mr. BOOHER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia as a substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 24, after the word "weevil," add "and destroying the Russian thistle."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to add "the Canadian thistle."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 24, after the word "weevil," add "and to destroy the Russian thistle."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. No other amendment can be in order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Texas by inserting the words "loco weed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting the words "loco weed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph last read on page 22, and I do this for the purpose of explaining an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman that all debate on this paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not so understand the proceedings. The motion was to limit debate on the paragraph then under consideration, which was a paragraph to which we had returned. Debate has not been closed nor has amendment been closed on the paragraph on page 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Chair was in error.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from South Dakota is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is to strike out the last word?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I desire to offer at this point, or if I can get unanimous consent to return to page 19, line 14, which would be a more appropriate place, is as follows:

Of which sum the amount of $10,000, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used for the purpose of making further investigations of the hardy and drought-resisting alfalfas of Siberia, and to obtain further seeds and plants thereof.

Evidently it would be in order at this point, but it is a question in my mind whether it would not be more appropriate as an amendment to the new section or new paragraph which the committee has inserted on page 19, beginning with line 9 and terminating with line 14. I would like to have the view of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would say that I think the Secretary has full authority now under this bill to do all of that, and I think he is doing it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Quite true; but I want to make that perfectly clear, and it can either be offered on page 22 or to line 14 on page 19. I ask unanimous consent to return to that page.

Mr. LAMB. Provided that the Secretary can do this work, and he is doing it now.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If there be no objection to unanimous consent to return to page 19, line 14, I will ask for that. The committee has made a rearrangement of this appropriation and has inserted that paragraph as a new paragraph. It provides for the investigation of foreign seeds and probably would belong there.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding to line 17, page 22, "of which sum the amount of $10,000, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used for the purpose of making further investigations of the hardy drought-resisting alfalfas of Siberia, and to obtain further seeds and plants thereof."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would say to my friend that under the general provisions of this bill the Secretary of Agriculture has been doing and can do all of this work.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think there is some little doubt about that. It is only for the purpose of making certain that there is such authority that I offer the amendment. I want to say just a word or two because I am in entire sympathy with the desire of the committee to proceed with the bill.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Is it not a fact that this House on a former occasion appropriated $40,000 for that particular purpose?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. And did not the Government buy more than 80,000 pounds of alfalfa which was especially drought-resisting?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. There was no special appropriation of that kind covering this item.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Does the gentleman say there is no appropriation for alfalfa that is drought resisting?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think there is; but this appropriation does not interfere with that, and this does specifically say that a certain part of the amount may be used for the purpose of further investigating and obtaining other seeds of hardy alfalfas of northern Siberia. Now, I want to explain just in a word the present status of that investigation.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I think debate is unnecessary. Let the gentleman refer to page 22, line 12. It says:

Provided further, That $39,000 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly; I am simply adding that as an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. Gentlemen are speaking at cross-purposes here. There is not any doubt in the world but that the Secretary of Agriculture now has authority, if he has the money, to do all the work the gentleman seeks to have done in his amendment. I think you will find, on page 19, lines 9 to 14, "for investigation in foreign seed and plant introduction."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I just asked the committee for the privilege of returning to offer this amendment to that item.

Mr. LEVER. I am confident, however, that the language of that item gives the gentleman all the authority that he wants, and I know that the Secretary of Agriculture is sending his experts abroad to introduce into these countries these foreign plants.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This does not make it any more binding than that item and does call on the department——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I believe there is no doubt that the Department of Agriculture is now doing this work. They have a man or more abroad now in various places in Asia making this investigation. There is no question about that.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Well, I am not certain whether there is anyone abroad now or not.

Mr. MANN. I know there is some one abroad now. They are abroad under this authority in the existing appropriation bill—a current appropriation bill—

To collect, purchase, propagate, test, and experiment with seeds of interest to agriculture—

And so forth.

Now, the item in that form is left out of this bill, but it is inserted in this way on page 19:

For investigations in foreign seeds and plant introduction, including the collection, study, purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds—

And so forth.

While the word is changed from "collect" to "collection," it means the same thing, and the Secretary now exercising the authority has kept Mr. Myers abroad, and will have the authority under the item in this year's bill, except that the amount this year is $83,000, whereas last year it was $52,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Secretary, in his report, on page 19, said:

The whole alfalfa question in the United States has been put on a new basis by the introduction of the Turkestan, Siberian, Arabian, and Peruvian alfalfas and the development of the hardy hybrid strains which grow in the Southwest throughout the winter.

Mr. MANN. They keep a man abroad working on this practically all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Now, I will ask the committee whether the amount available for this sort of work has been increased in this item on page 19?

Mr. LAMB. Increased $40,000 over last year.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. As near as I can figure the items of the committee in their present form, there was an increase of about $10,000 for the two items together. Now, do I understand the gentlemen in charge of the bill claim this item which is covered by my amendment and for which some additional appropriation apparently has been made can be carried on by the Secretary under the bill as now drawn?

Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly; and he is now doing work which the gentleman seeks to have done.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, what is the objection to this amendment?

Mr. LEVER. We do not desire to load the bill down with new language.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield there, I can give an objection that will be perfectly apparent to him. If the gentleman's item would go in, the agent abroad would have to be paid out of some item to pass the auditor's office, and he would have to confine his work, if he is paid out of the alfalfa item, as the gentleman proposes, to the study of alfalfa abroad, whereas now he is given authority to study all plants abroad, and he is paid out of the general item, and there is no trouble at the auditor's office.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, just a word or two before I yield the floor.

There is no subject of greater importance to all of that plains country between the Panhandle of Texas and our northern boundary lines than the procuring of these hardy alfalfa seeds from northern Siberia. It has come under my observation from what has occurred in the past. Dr. Hansen, of the Agricultural College of South Dakota, was sent to Siberia in 1897, 1906, and 1908 to obtain these plants. Some very important and hardy alfalfas were found on the trip of 1906. In 1908 a limited quantity of the seeds and plants was brought to the United States and used for experimental purposes by the farmers in South Dakota and other parts of the Great Plains area during the last year or two with very encouraging results. The field, however, was not entirely covered, and I may say in the correspondence which I have had, seeking some information or light upon this subject, I have a letter from Dr. Hansen, who made the exploration, which took him 1,000 miles away from the railroad, into a country where these plants grow wild and in their native state, and where the rainfall is only 9 inches a year. In seeking information from Dr. Hansen recently I have the following statement:

Briefly, the campaign is one for a more abundant meat supply by increasing the forage-producing capacity of the dry uplands extending from the Pan Handle of Texas to our northern boundaries. Some of these alfalfas are native of a region where the climatic extremes range from 44 degrees below zero in winter to about 122 degrees heat in summer, with a rainfall as low as 9 inches.

In my 1906 tour the Siberian alfalfas were first discovered. In 1908 I had the job to cover Siberia from east to west to locate fields where the tallest and best strains were to be found, but it was too big a job for one summer, inasmuch as traveling a thousand miles from railway, more or less, is slow work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the face of the apparent fact that the amount of appropriation for this general work of investigation of new and important seed plants has been increased, and with the assurance of the committee that the bill in its present form would cover an extension of this class of investigation of these particularly important plants which we need in the West, I will not insist upon my amendment, but I will ask leave to print as a part of my remarks some correspondence which I have had with the explorer who made these original trips.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following are the letters referred to:

SOUTH DAKOTA AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Brookings, January 14, 1913.

Hon. E. W. MARTIN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am very busy preparing a bulletin on the alfalfas which I found growing wild in Siberia in 1906 and 1908. Upward of 1,500 farmers are cooperating with me in this work of testing the few plants, and many report remarkable results showing drouth resistance and ability to endure severe cold without snow cover. Efforts will be made to get a State appropriation for extending the work by field demonstrations, so that an abundance of seed may be raised for local distribution, especially in the western part of the State.

It is very expensive going 1,000 miles from railway with a fully equipped expedition of men and horses, which is the only way of getting this seed. A small congressional appropriation, say of $5,000, would help greatly, but it would not be a good plan unless it be distinctly specified that it was for the purpose of my finishing alfalfa investigations which I have already started by my three trips to Siberia in 1897, 1906, and 1908, as I have had to learn the work from the very beginning. A new man would have to learn it all over again.

Cordially, yours,

N. E. HANSEN.

SIBERIAN ALFALFA IN STANLEY COUNTY, S. DAK.

Upward of 1,500 farmers are cooperating with me in testing the alfalfas which were found growing wild in Siberia in 1906 and 1908. The following letter is a sample. After inspecting some of the plants I sent in spring 1911 to Henry L. Jeffries, Sansarc, S. Dak.; John W. Horning, of Hayes, S. Dak.; wrote a letter under date of August 3, 1912, from which the following are extracts:

"* * * Seeing Mr. Jeffries's plants and knowing what the plants you left are doing is prima facie evidence that your new Siberian alfalfas will find an adapted home here, and that the development of this country will now depend upon the same. This has proven another very unfavorable season for the settlers here, and they are leaving every day, many never to return. The ones that are determined to stay and try to develop the country are doing so at a sacrifice. My people and I are determined to stay, and have hopes in the cultivation of your alfalfa. * * *

"You will find the country far more depopulated than when you were here. The settlers had to go, as they were at the limit of their means, and many are staying now hoping for better conditions in the future, and who are in very adverse circumstances.

"I am sure you appreciate the true sense of this letter and, knowing that you are interested with me in the development of this country, I feel certain that you will give this your most careful consideration. * * *"

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 2, 1913.

Prof. N. E. HANSEN, Brookings, S. Dak.

DEAR PROF. HANSEN: I am pleased to notice by your letter of December 28 that the theories we had with regard to getting hardy plants from countries colder and drier than South Dakota west of the Missouri River have been justified by developments. I think the Siberian alfalfas and plants coming from Africa, together will eventually reclaim our dry-land belt running from the Gulf of Mexico up to our northern line. Every State having a dry belt, and they all have in the territory I have described, should use all possible effort to get these plants propagated and disseminated among the people. I will speak to Dr. Galloway, who is in charge of our explorers, of the benefit that would come by sending you out again to these northern Asiatic regions to bring us more of those plants or the seed of them. It would be one of the wisest investments the State of South Dakota could make to encourage the getting of these plants for the people. My time in the Department of Agriculture will cease on the 4th of March, when I retire to private life. I will not have the authority to select explorers after that time, but the necessity for this work is pretty well understood by the scientists of the department. South Dakota can afford to act for itself if the Federal Government does not do all you think it should do.

I hope you will complete that bulletin that we have been discussing. I would like to have it before I retire, so that I could have it printed and distributed.

Very truly, yours, JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, 1912.

SIBERIAN ALFALFAS.

Our dry-land problems will be measurably solved through alfalfas From Siberia and nonsaccharine sorghums from Africa (p. 10).

The whole alfalfa question in the United States has been put on a new basis by the introduction of the Turkestan, Siberian, Arabian, and Peruvian alfalfas and the development of the hardy hybrid strains which grow in the Southwest throughout the winter (p. 119).

During the past year an agricultural explorer was sent through the steppe regions of western Siberia, south of Omsk, to make a detailed study of the behavior of the yellow-flowered, hardy alfalfa on the cattle ranches there, and he made contracts with the peasants for all the possible seed for special experimental tests of this plant in the Northwest (p. 120).

A number of wild forage legumes from the Siberian steppes have been located and are now being secured in quantities for distribution and testing in the years to come (p. 120).

During the past year marked advance has been made in the work with the hardy and drought-resistent alfalfas introduced from Europe and Asia. The crossing of the yellow-flowered form with the common species has resulted in some very promising hybrids, adapted to use both as hay and for grazing in the Great Plains region. The value of the new alfalfa for hybridizing can scarcely be overestimated (p. 121).

ALASKA.

Plants of alfalfa obtained by Prof. N. E. Hansen in Siberia and northern Europe have been given trial and have proved hardy for two winters at Rampart. These are being propagated as rapidly as possible, to extend their use for forage and to increase the nitrogen of the soil, most Alaskan soils being deficient in this important element (p. 103).

RAMPART, ALASKA.

Siberian alfalfas have been successfully introduced and have withstood the winter climate for two years (p. 218).

SOUTH DAKOTA AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Brookings, January 27, 1913.

Hon. E. W. MARTIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 18th instant, a bulletin covering this Siberian alfalfa work is already in the hands of the printer, and I trust will be out in time so that I can send you a copy to post you in full. I am leaving to-night for the Conservation and Development Congress at Pierre, which will be held January 28, 29, and 30. As soon as I get back I will answer your letter more in detail. Briefly, the campaign is one for a more abundant meat supply by increasing the forage-producing capacity of the dry uplands, extending from the Panhandle of Texas to our northern boundaries. Some of these alfalfas are native of a region where the climatic extremes range from 44° below zero in winter to about 122° heat in summer, with a rainfall as low as 9 inches.

In my 1906 tour the Siberian alfalfa was first discovered. In 1908 I had the job to cover Siberia from east to west to locate fields where the tallest and best strains were to be found, but it was too big a job for one summer, inasmuch as traveling a thousand miles from railway, more or less, is slow work.

My plan would be to get seed in quantity of some of the best of these, and some additional varieties, I think, can be secured, especially where the Siberian and Turkestan alfalfas overlap.

I mentioned the figure $5,000, as I thought that could be obtained readily, and with the hope that the State legislature would grant a small appropriation to eke that out. But if the exploration is to be an extensive one for hundreds of people hunting for seed over many square miles, the expense will be greater—nearer $15,000 than $5,000. In time, I think, much more will be granted for the purpose. Such things come slowly. It is an effort, not to replace the common alfalfa wherever that does well, but to extend the alfalfa fields to our driest and highest uplands. My machine-transplanting method will hasten all this work some 50 years. Last spring I adapted a tobacco planter for alfalfa, so that we put in the plants at the rate of 6,000 per hour.

Yours, truly,

N. E. HANSEN.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend in the RECORD the remarks which I made on this bill on the 6th and 7th instant.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to the gentleman extending his remarks in the RECORD. I am going to object, however, to gentlemen having the privilege of revising their remarks in the RECORD. Gentlemen now have the privilege of making all corrections of any remarks which they submit, but ought not to have permission of the House to strike out anything which they have said in the House.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will say that I do not care to revise my remarks but to extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I am glad the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] withdrew his amendment, because, being in hearty sympathy with what he desires to accomplish, I believe the amendment would have been an unfortunate one. I want to congratulate the committee on having segregated these two items—the one on page 19 and the one on page 22. The provision on page 19 is one for the investigation, testing, propagation, and so forth, and refers generally to those plants that we seek abroad, of course including alfalfa. The item on page 22 specifically provides for the purchase and distribution of seeds, and under that item we hope a considerable portion of the $39,000 will be used for the purchase and distribution of alfalfa. We have been endeavoring for quite a number of years to secure sufficient of the drought and cold resisting alfalfas to have them thoroughly tested in the West, but we have been unable to secure any considerable quantity from the department until this year. The amount now furnished, while much larger than they have been able to furnish in the past, is still rather inadequate to meet the demands. I am in hopes that under the item now in the bill we will secure a sufficient amount of these alfalfa and other seeds to have them introduced in the country in which they are needed.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman know whether, under this purchasing clause, page 22, the hardy alfalfa seed can be purchased? Are they available?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Where can they be found?

Mr. MONDELL. Several varieties are now grown in various parts of the country, and the department is securing them, but under the other item they will continue to propagate, so that, I think, under the two items, the one clearly providing for investigation and collection and propagation and the other for the purchase of the seed, we will be able to secure more of these seeds than we have.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think with the gentleman that the committee had done right in separating these items. It is a logical classification, and I congratulate the committee upon the new arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment that I offered on Friday evening is now pending before the committee.

My amendment, Mr. Chairman, proposed to strike out the item on page 19, beginning with line 22, and following up to strike out page 20 and page 21 and down to line 17 of page 22. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to consume very much time in the discussion of this question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman desire to strike out the entire paragraph and leave out the item of $39,000 for the purchase and distribution of drought-resistant field seeds, and so forth?

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that I have an amendment to offer later on to save that in the event this paragraph should go out.

Mr. MANN. I asked that question for the information of the House.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would be the last man on the floor of this House who would deny any benefit to the farmers of this country or strike a blow at their interests.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, is it understood that the gentleman from Indiana has 10 minutes in opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. COX. I do not want it taken out of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I say I would be the last Member of this House who would for a moment strike a blow at the farming interests of the country, because I believe that the farmers of the country form the very basis of all our prosperity. I believe when the farming community is prosperous the Nation as a whole is prosperous. But it does seem to me that we have gone the limit in this bill. Indeed, it seems to me we have gone beyond the limit in this bill, and this is one of the items which, so far as I am personally concerned, I can not entertain.

We are proposing in this paragraph to expend $296,000 for the purchase of seeds for free distribution to the farmers of this country.

I called up the Post Office Department a few days ago with a view to seeing or getting at as near as I could what the cost would be to the people of this country on account of this item. I found that the agricultural appropriation bill of last year carried an item of $285,000 for this same purpose. Gen. Stewart, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, estimated that it would cost $283,643 to send that amount of seed through the mails. I called up Dr. Galloway, and I found out from him that in addition to the $285,000 expended for this purpose last year there was an item of $27,000 which went to the payment of salaries, traveling expenses, and so forth, making a showing of fact, on this item last year of $285,000, of an actual cost to the people of this country of $596,323 upon the seed distribution.

This year the item carries the amount of $296,000, and, of course, Mr. Chairman, it will cost more than $600,000 to the taxpayers of this country before this seed finally reaches its destination.

I have always had an idea that the people imagined in some way or in some manner or somehow that this seed was not bought and paid for by them. I have had an idea in my mind, and I have it yet, that the people believe that these seeds, as a rule, are grown and propagated by the Department of Agriculture upon its experimental farms in the country.

I wonder whether or not they would stand for it if they actually knew the fact that they were being assessed more than $600,000 to buy $300,000 worth of seed. I wonder whether or not they would stand for it if they realized that they were paying a salary roll of $27,000 a year and were assessed that much in the department for the purpose of collecting these seeds to be distributed free.

I find in the Book of Estimates this year an estimate of $4,000 or $4,400 for traveling expenses, to be saddled on the people next year for somebody traveling over this country or over the world, wherever the travel might be required, for the purpose of buying seeds for free distribution to the people of this country. I believe, Mr. Chairman, if the people only knew the fact, the exact truth of the situation, and knew that they were being assessed and being taxed each year $600,000 for the sole purpose of getting to them the small amount of $300,000 worth of seeds, they would not stand it.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, the whole thing is unfair. It is absolutely unjust. It is inequitable. The amount allotted to each Member is 18,000 or 20,000 packages. I have upward of 50,000 voters in my district, enabling me to send a package of seed to about one-third of the voters of my district. It is called free seeds, and this idea of being free is somewhat catchy to the people, but when the facts are found out that for every dollar we are actually expending for seeds we are spending more than a dollar to get that dollar's worth of seeds to the people.

This extra dollar goes to the railroad and transportation companies, for salaries, and so forth. In other words, we are expending $296,000 for the purchase of seeds, and then spending more than $300,000 to get the seeds to the people. From a business standpoint it is a losing game. Instead of being free to the people, the truth is they are paying twice as much for these seeds as the same would cost them at home. And the seeds are no better than the seeds which can be bought at home. In fact, in many instances the seeds are the same, bought and purchased by the department from the seed houses in the open market.

I firmly believe that if the farmers throughout the country only knew how they were being hoodwinked in this "free" seed distribution they would not stand for it one minute.

As an illustration, I have in my district approximately 50,000 voters. My district is largely an agricultural community. I believe my allotment of seeds is between 18,000 and 20,000 packages. As a matter of fact, it is impossible for me to treat all of my constituents equally and justly. Therefore, by reason of the small amount of the appropriation I am unable to give more than one-third of my constituents a small package of garden seeds each.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. Every time this agricultural appropriation bill comes up for consideration in this House some gentleman picks out the farmer as the individual upon whom to practice economy. Some gentlemen begrudge the small package of seed that now goes annually to him from the Department of Agriculture. It costs only one-third as much to secure these seed and send them to the farmers of the country as you expend now annually for pneumatic-tube service in the cities. The gentleman speaks about the Government buying these seeds on the outside. I want to say to the gentleman that we do get these seed from men who give attention to producing choice seed for this very purpose. Care is now exercised in the selection of these seed. Dr. Galloway refuses tons and tons of seed every year because they are faulty and unfit for distribution. [Applause.] They no longer palm off on the farmer the character of seeds that used to go out from the department, but we now have men to select seeds, and the very best seeds are selected for this annual distribution. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Is it not a fact that the Government itself purchases these seeds?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does it purchase them in the open market, in competition?

Mr. HEFLIN. The fact that the Government does purchase these seed gives somebody an opportunity to sell seeds and to grow good seeds for the purpose of distribution. [Applause.] But I will tell you where the nigger in the woodpile is. Seed interests outside are sore because Dr. Galloway condemns carloads of seed as unfit for distribution amongst the people, and they have trouble selling these condemned seed that the Government would not use. It works well in both ways, you see.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no further time. It gives the department an opportunity to find the very best seeds that it is possible to find in the United States, and to send them out amongst the people, that they may have the opportunity to get the very best seed in the world.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest to these gentlemen that if they want to give their views on economy to possess their souls in patience and try their hands on battleships or something else. Let the farmer get his little package of seeds from Uncle Sam. They are of value to him. I beg my sharpshooting friends not to shoot into this provision of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything in reference to this very important matter, but, in view of the fact that it has assumed gigantic proportions and has been under investigation not only by the Agricultural Department, but by the Post Office Department, I have thought it proper to submit a few remarks.

Everybody will admit that the greatest department of this Government is the Agricultural Department, because it reaches more people and accomplishes more good than any other department of this great Government.

As was suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a moment ago, it is an important matter to send something directly from the Government of the United States to the farmer himself at least once a year. The truth of it is that the only direct communication between the Government, supported by the farmer, and the farmer himself is that which is found in the message carried to him once a year by the distribution of seeds, and the record shows that the benefits that have been derived from this, the greatest department of the Government, are directly traceable to the distribution of seeds, because the establishment of the department itself was brought about by reason of the fact that the disposition of seeds was begun way back in the commencement of this great Republic.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; briefly.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman think that if the Government furnishes the seeds it should also furnish one of these experts to show them how to plant and cultivate them?

Mr. CANDLER. The expert is furnished to tell them how to plant and cultivate them through the bulletins that my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has referred to. Furthermore, on the package of seeds itself there is carried a message telling them what they are and how to plant and cultivate them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these seed, as was said by the gentleman from Alabama, are the very best that can be obtained. They are not all purchased in the open market, but a great many of them are, and every year there is submitted to the Department of Agriculture 200 or more competitive bids from which the seed are selected. They are required to come up to the highest type, they are required to germinate a certain high per cent, they must be true to type, and the very best seed that can be obtained from the growers, not only by competitive bids, are obtained, but some considerable part of them are produced under the direct supervision of the Government experts.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CANDLER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that there is no complaint made by the real farmer about the distribution and value of the seed, but the complaints come from people who would very rarely raise a crop from any kind of seed?

Mr. CANDLER. That may be true.

Mr. COX. That is not true in the third district of Indiana.

Mr. CANDLER. I have heard no complaints from anybody to whom the seed has been sent. The only complaints I have had were from people who said they did not get the seed, but had been overlooked. No longer ago than this morning I received a letter from a man who said that I had overlooked him. I want to say that the seed will go to him before the sun goes down to-night, as I am always glad to respond to all requests from my constituents, and do so promptly. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to take away from the farmers of this country a single solitary thing they now receive unless you furnish them with a better substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the expense of sending out these seeds is only one dollar out of forty carried in the bill, and only one dollar out of over two thousand dollars expended by Congress.

Mr. CANDLER. I am obliged to the gentleman for the information. As I was saying Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to take away from the farmers of this country anything they now receive unless they are furnished with something better in lieu of it. When the farmer, as is demonstrated by facts and figures furnished by the Government of the United States itself, is largely supporting the Government and maintaining its prosperity and carrying it on to greater achievement and more glorious development, I am not going to turn and take away from him even one little package of seed. But for their help to-day this Government would be a Nation indebted to the other nations of the world, but by reason of the fact that they have come to the rescue of the Government itself and of the people of this Nation, we are to-day a creditor nation having the balance of trade upon our side, and other nations are indebted to us by billions of dollars, whereas it would have been millions of dollars against us but for them. When they have discharged this great and patriotic duty and are standing up like men for the credit and prosperity of the Nation, contributing to its resources, welfare, and prosperity, I say it would not only be unjust, but in my opinion ungenerous, to take anything away from them which they are now receiving, and so far as I can prevent it it shall never be done, unless you give them something better. The people are my friends and I shall stand for their interests at all times as God gives me light to see the right. [Applause.]

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my colleague from Indiana [Mr. COX] on making this motion, although I am aware that it will not probably prevail. I wish to say that the valid objection is not so much, in my opinion, in the making of a present to the farmer, to be paid for by public funds, as the fact that this present must come through a Member of Congress. The very terms of this appropriation bill are that the seeds must be distributed on the order of the Congressmen, and no man from my district can write to the Secretary of Agriculture and get his order filled without an indorsement from me; and that is true of every other congressional district.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Oh, no; there is this provision in the bill:

And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking from my own information and stating the facts as they exist under the procedure of the department. I went to the department and asked the reason why seeds were not sent direct to all applicants. I found that not only were these requests denied, but that the Department of Agriculture has a card prepared, which they send to every applicant for seeds, stating that the application must be sent to their Congressman; so that there can be no question about it. You are making an appropriation for a distribution of seeds, and then you attach to it a condition that nobody can secure any benefit except he applies to you as a Member of Congress. And if this provision were to be eliminated from the free-seed distribution the appropriation, in my opinion, would soon disappear from the bill.

We may as well be frank to the people of this country. It is not necessary to mislead the people as to what they receive when they are sent congressional seeds. The department does not buy new and rare varieties of seeds. As a matter of fact, the men who buy these seeds say they buy the commonest kind, so that they can get a large quantity for the money and thus make the distribution more general; and more than that, they purchase from the seedsmen of this country seeds that are two years old. Of course, they have to germinate or to meet a germination test; but of those seeds that are sold by retail over this country the packets which remain unsold at the close of the season are re-collected and are then sold to the Government of the United States for distribution under the congressional seed appropriation during the following year.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, in the report it says that the Secretary's quota for distribution direct to miscellaneous applicants, including State agricultural experiment stations, schools, hospitals, Army posts, crop reporters, cooperators, and American citizens in foreign countries was 1,000,000 packages of vegetable seed and 150,000 of flower seed.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to go into that. These were given by the Secretary to special classes as rewards for special services. They do not apply to the citizen of a district who applies for seeds in the ordinary way. So that you are not distributing any new kind of seeds, but the commonest kinds that can be obtained.

Another thing. The Department of Agriculture itself has never recommended that this distribution be made or continued. I challenge any gentleman on the floor of this House belonging to the Agricultural Committee to produce any estimate or any recommendation from the department within the last 10 years, asking that this congressional seed distribution be continued. As a matter of fact, under Mr. Cleveland's administration, the Secretary of Agriculture refused to send the seeds out after the money was appropriated, and there was a special vote of Congress compelling him to recognize the terms of law and purchase the seeds. There never has been from that time to this a recommendation by the Department of Agriculture in favor of this practice. It is kept up purely by congressional authority as a kind of exclusive patronage to be dispensed by the Members themselves.

One other matter about the demand. All agricultural organizations are on record opposing it, and the people themselves are not in favor of it. Since I have been a Member of Congress, excepting this year, I have placed a notice in every paper published in the fifth district of Indiana, saying that I would send a package of seed to every person in the district who desired it, and I have never yet gotten requests from one-third enough constituents to take up the seeds that are furnished to me. After having continued this advertising custom three years and after having filled every request which came in response, I was able last year to give to gentlemen from the South who came to me whole sackfuls of seed in order that they might send them down to the overflowed section of the Mississippi Valley to be used for replanting the gardens which had been destroyed. This year I have just sent out a notice, in order to get rid of them, to every school-teacher in the fifth district that I will be glad to send seeds to every scholar in the public schools. If there is any justification for this expenditure, it is in being able to supply the public schools with seeds for experimentation, and thereby possibly interesting the young in agricultural and horticultural pursuits.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 13, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, beginning with line 22, page 19, and strike out all down to the bottom of pages 19, 20, 21, and 22 down to line 17, and insert the following:

"Purchase and distribution of rare and valuable seeds and plants: For purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of rare and valuable seeds and bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experimenting with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country, and same shall be used for experimental test, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experimental stations, $39,000."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $2,607,165.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before we leave this section of the bill, I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question in regard to an item to which my attention has been directed by letter. That is on line 11, page 16, the item for investigating the handling, grading, and transportation of grain, $65,000. I desire to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, and in the opinion of the committee, a sufficient amount of money has been allowed to pursue the work of standardization of grain, without delay or in any way jeopardizing the work now being done by the department as along that line.

Mr. LAMB. I think we increased that a little.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, we increased that something over $9,000.

Mr. LAMB. They asked for an increase of that paragraph, and we, after discussing it and hearing the department, gave them $9,000 more, and I think I can answer the gentleman's question by saying it is ample for the purposes of fixing grades on grain, etc.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is stated to me that the department is now engaged in standardizing corn, or rather establishing standard grades for corn, and it was hoped that sufficient money would be allowed to complete this work, so as not to delay the work of standardizing grades for wheat and oats. Has that been done?

Mr. LAMB. Well, we gave them all they asked; that is all I can say to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say anything on the subject myself, except to say that this is a matter of extreme importance to the grain trade. The grain trade of this country, as I understand it, is practically up in the air because of the failure to standardize grain. The grain trade is in a very unsettled condition, and it is exceedingly important that this standardization be carried on just as rapidly as possible, in order that the grain interests of the country may understand the condition, and also that the necessary laws may be passed in order to enforce these standards or grades that may be fixed by the department; and, without consuming the time of the committee further, I want to read a letter which I have received from Mr. Charles D. Jones, of Nashville, Tenn., who is president of the Grain Dealers' National Association, and who presents the matter in the clearest and most forcible manner. I offer that for the information of the committee and ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The letter is as follows:

GRAIN DEALERS' NATIONAL ASSOCIATION,
Nashville, Tenn., February 5, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BYRNS: There is a matter before Congress in which the grain trade of this country is most vitally interested. As you are no doubt aware, the question for standards of grain has agitated the grain trade of this country for a good many years.

There have been bills introduced, both in the House and Senate, attempting to place in the hands of the Government the inspection of grain. This, the grain men of the country have as a class opposed, but we have asked the Government to standardize the grades and then pass such laws as will enforce those standards on all markets. To this end the Agricultural Department has been working in a scientific manner, Dr. J. W. F. Duvel having been in active charge of this work. Dr. Duvel has almost completed his investigations regarding the corn, and will, in a short time, be prepared to pass on what he considers the proper standards for corn; that is, provided an appropriation is made which will enable him to continue his investigations. At the present time all this work has been stopped, or practically so, on account of the lack of funds to prosecute the work. I understand that in the present agricultural appropriation bill the Secretary has requested an increased appropriation of $20,000, a part of which was to be used for fixing standards for corn, the remainder to be used in establishing a laboratory on the Pacific coast, which will be necessary before the Government will be able to successfully pass on the standards for wheat and oats such as are produced on the Pacific coast and intermountain area.

This bill has been referred to the House committee with an increase of only a little over $9,000. If that bill goes through the House and the Senate, it will certainly jeopardize the movement for grain standardization, as it would delay the corn grades for another year and prolong the wheat and oat grades almost indefinitely, neither of which would be acceptable to the grain dealers or producers of this country.

There are few questions before the National Government to-day of such great importance as this grain standardization, and as president of this association, as well as a southern grain man, I want to ask you to use your influence in getting this appropriation sufficiently large to enable this work to be prosecuted to an early conclusion. As it is now, the grain trade is up in the air, so to speak. We are needing these standards badly. If an amendment could be offered in the House increasing this appropriation to forty or fifty thousand dollars to enable such work to be rapidly pushed, it certainly would be money well spent in a good cause, and whoever succeeds in doing that will be forever cherished as a friend to the grain trade. Where a large interest, like the grain trade of this country, is operating in such an unsettled state as it is to-day, nothing should be left undone to pass the necessary laws to give the business the required stability. The entire grain trade of this country is looking to the Government for an early settlement of this question. It is vital to the interest, and I hope that if any retrenchments in the way of appropriation will be necessary that it will not be at the expense of this grain standardization.

Assuring you of my official and personal appreciation of the efforts which I am sure you will make, I am,

Very truly, yours,

CHAS D. JONES,
President.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of this bill a question or two. Just what does the Agriculture Department do in the matter of fixing grain standards?

Mr. LAMB. I will state what they say in asking for this increase of $10,000 for investigating, handling, grading, and transportation of grain and fixing definite standards thereof. The Bureau of Plant Industry is just about ready to standardize corn, and additional funds will be required for that purpose. It is intended to encourage and instruct special agencies in the matter of not only standardizing grain, but to now effect uniform standards throughout the country. Commercial organizations and agencies are anxious to have it done. They are continually expressing the desire that these standards be fixed as soon as possible. What they have in mind is unless that is done there may be a step in one way or another to have Federal inspection of grain, and that is something that the majority of the grain people in the country seem to avoid.

Mr. BARTLETT. Which Congress has refused to do time and time again.

Mr. MADDEN. The information which I wish to obtain is, how many grades of wheat, for example, has the Agriculture Department established?

Mr. LAMB. I could not tell you.

Mr. MADDEN. Where do they have their inspection headquarters?

Mr. LAMB. In different localities—one at New Orleans, one at Baltimore, and one at Chicago.

Mr. MADDEN. What effect does the standard fixed by the Agriculture Department have on the value of the grain?

Mr. LAMB. Now, I can not stand that civil-service examination. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. What is the purpose of establishing the standards if nothing is to be gained by it, and if nobody knows anything about the reason for the establishment of the bureau fixing the standards, why should we make an appropriation? That is what I want to know.

Mr. LAMB. If the gentleman will look on page 18 of the hearings by Dr. Galloway, he will find there is right much on that subject. I do not believe the gentleman would like to take the time of the committee by reading the hearings before that committee, because it is not a practical question on which we can reach a result right now, and I am satisfied that the gentleman is anxious, as I am, to proceed with this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I assume this is a very practical question or the Committee on Agriculture, as careful as they are in the expenditure of other people's money, would not offer to make an appropriation, because if there are not any results to be obtained and there is not anything practicable about it, then we ought not to appropriate.

Mr. LAMB. Do not understand me to mean that. I stated I did not care to go into a discussion of this question, as I did not think we could reach any result about it, so far as the bill is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to submit a word here. I think it should be very well understood that the Agricultural Department is not trying to fix a standard for grain and have it adopted by law. I understand the department is not attempting to fix the definite grades to the extent of having them adopted by law, but only studying the conditions which go to make up the grades—the things that enter into grain that fix different grades. Now, I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to say whether or not it is the purpose to have the Federal Government fix a standard for grain, such as No. 1 red and No. 2 red, and so forth.

Mr. LAMB. Here is what Dr. Galloway says about it, and I will read it, if I may have the indulgence of the committee for a short time. He says:

Mr. WHITACRE. Speaking about the standardization or grading of corn or wheat, have you been doing some work along that line?

Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITACRE. For how many years?

Dr. GALLOWAY. We have been working now on these standards—of course, this is all in connection with the marketing—for about six years.

Mr. WHITACRE. How many years more will it take to find out how or four more years for wheat.

Dr. GALLOWAY. We are ready to standardize corn now; the fundamentals for that have been worked out, and it will probably take three or four more years for wheat.

Mr. WHITACRE. Why has it taken you such a great length of time to find out how many different grades of wheat there are?

Dr. GALLOWAY. It is a question of what should enter into the grades. The interested parties are not agreed whether we should consider the milling quality or moisture content; and if the moisture content is finally agreed upon, as it has been in corn, then we must work out specific methods for readily determining the moisture content.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Then, Mr. Chairman, that accords with my own understanding about this. We have laboratories in six of the principal States of the Union, but they in no sense commit the Agricultural Department to fix the grades of grain for the purpose of having them adopted by law. If they did I would ask to have it stricken out.

Mr. MANN. It is not in order to strike it out. But I ask for the regular order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chugach National Forest, Alaska, $22,530.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. First, a parliamentary inquiry: Should I wait until the end of the paragraph, or is this the proper place?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The Chair thinks each line of this is a paragraph. If the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment he had best offer it now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to offer an amendment on line 20, page 27.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I move to strike out all of line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 20, strike out all of the line.

Mr. LAMB. Is it the gentleman's intention to destroy that forest by leaving it uncared for?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; that is the intention of it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not intend to destroy the forest?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; but I want to destroy the appropriation. That is what I thought the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] meant.

Mr. LAMB. I understand the gentleman's facetiousness, but I want to know——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask for some information. What is the purpose of having the forest reserve?

Mr. LAMB. What is the purpose of having any of them? I will answer the question by asking another.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In the first place, the forest reserve is supposed to preserve or protect a forest. But you have no forest here.

Mr. LAMB. I have never been in this forest. I do not know how much land is there or how many trees. But Mr. Graves, the Forester, has been given authority to make these units of forest, and he has apportioned a lump sum to all of these forests, according to his best judgment in the matter, and I do not think it would be proper to strike out one any more than all of them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If they are all like this one, they ought all to be stricken out.

Mr. FERRIS. What are the facts about this?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The facts in regard to this forest reserve are, in the first place, that there is only about 10 per cent of that forest reserve that has timber on it. In the next place, it needs no protection from fire, because they have 140 inches of rainfall there annually, and you could not burn it if you desired. It is not to protect water power or stream flow, and I do not know of any reason why that forest reserve is there except to give employment to somebody.

Mr. MADDEN. How much land does this cover?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Something like 800,000 acres.

Mr. FERRIS. When was this created?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was created by Executive order——

Mr. FERRIS. How long has that been in existence?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know.

Mr. FERRIS. About how long? I do not care for the particular date.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was created by Executive order dated the 23d of July, 1907. Now, I would like to know what has been——

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to proceed a little further. It was created in 1907 by Executive order and embodies 800,000 acres?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it has probably been added to since then. There were 850,000 acres in the first instance.

Mr. FERRIS. What proportion of it is covered by timber?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. From the best information I can get it is about 10 per cent.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it agricultural in character, and would it have any value if not in a forest reserve?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I think not.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the use of subjecting it to the ordeal of having the timber cut off?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not able to understand why Congress should pay out $22,000 a year for men to watch this reserve.

Now, you have been looking for some place to economize, and I congratulate the majority on that position. But I would like some one to tell me some reason why you are going to pay $22,000 a year for the care of this forest reserve.

Mr. LAMB. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that if the gentleman from Washington had come before our committee we would have taken his views into consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. LAMB. I do not like to object, Mr. Chairman, but can the gentleman give us any further information about this forest reserve—this particular one?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I will if the gentleman does not have any information; I will try to give the House some that I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, of this forest reserve, as I have said, only about one-tenth of its area has timber. Most of what timber there is on it is utterly unfit for any merchantable purpose. There is no reason for having a reserve up there to protect this forest from fire. There is no other reason that I have ever been able to discover for this great expense except to give some one a job.

Why not get rid of this expense? The only purpose that I know, so far as this forest reserve is concerned, is to feed some of the parasites representing the Government who are playing spies on the people. They create trouble, but they do protect the forests.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. What percentage of it can be converted into homesteads?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know that any of it can be; very little, at most. You take all of Alaska that is accessible and put it into a forest reserve and then pay employees, whose only purpose is to make trouble, to stay there under pretense that they are protecting the forests.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. If there are 800,000 acres in the forest reserve and practically only 10 per cent of it is in timber, why should not the President eliminate 90 per cent of it and reserve the timber on the remaining 10 per cent? It ought not to be subject to entry if it is clearly timberland.

Mr. LEVER. How long has it been since the gentleman from Washington got the information he has about this forest reserve?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have known it for some time and I took occasion yesterday to look it up particularly, to see about it a little more definitely, and I looked at your report, and I did not find any information about it there.

Mr. LEVER. There is not any Member of Congress, and I do not believe there is anybody on top of the earth, who knows much about the national forests. We have got to take somebody's word about them. I was wondering whether the gentleman had visited this place himself and had special information concerning it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; but there is no reason why you should hire some one to stay on that forest reserve. What are these men doing?

Mr. LEVER. This, Mr. Chairman, is an attempt, is it, to get some forest-reserve lands out from the possession of the Government, so that somebody may get coal claims up there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. LAMB. I object, Mr. Chairman. I think we have had enough on this.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like some one to give me some information about this forest reserve—to tell me what these men do that we are paying $22,000 to annually.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, did anyone object?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] to object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that he is not going to save time by objecting. This is an important question. Most of the time that has been allotted to me has been taken up by questions.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is recognized. Does the gentleman from Virginia object?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; I object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the gentlemen will have to keep a quorum here during the consideration of this bill if they deny my request for five minutes' extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. The gentleman from Washington will be in order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will agree that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I ask unanimous consent for that.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman from Washington withdraw his point of no quorum.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will withdraw the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman. I have no desire to delay the consideration of this bill, but I do desire to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington withdraw the point of order?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, I hope I shall not be interrupted for a moment or two. If these gentlemen on the Committee on Agriculture have no information upon this subject, I shall try to give them a little.

In the first place, as I said, Mr. Chairman, according to information I have received, there is only 10 per cent of this forest reserve that has timber on it. They have 140 inches of rainfall a year on at least part of it and a large amount on all of it. There is no reason for a forest reserve up there and no reason for having men up there to watch it. There is no purpose in keeping men up there; none whatever, except to furnish them with jobs.

Here is where you could economize and really benefit the Government. You ought to strike this appropriation out. By so doing you are not going to do injustice to anybody. You are paying here $22,000 for services that are of absolutely no value to anyone

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to have the gentleman tell us in what respect this differs from other forest reserves.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In this particular: There is no necessity of protecting it from fire. There is no reason that I know of why it ever was created. It costs a great deal more to take care of it than the Government gets out of it, according to the figures I have examined. It costs the Government twice as much as they get from the sale of timber. If anyone wants to use that timber, most of it unmerchantable, why not let them do it? Otherwise it will rot in the forests.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think, under his own statement, which is in substance that there are 800,000 acres in all and that 10 per cent is timbered, that to strike out $22,530 and insert in lieu thereof $2,000 so that a man could be kept there until the President could determine whether it was necessary by Executive order to eliminate the other nine-tenths, would be wise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If there is any duty for a man to perform up there I would not object, but I have not been able to ascertain that there is.

Mr. FERRIS. If it is really timbered land and belongs to the Federal Government, if you vacate it it will become open to homestead entry and you will have the same trouble that we had before.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a statement entitled "Detailed estimates for forest reserves," and I find that the area as given by the Forester himself, instead of being 800,000 acres, as the gentleman from Washington stated, is 11,267,850 acres. The gentleman from Washington himself says that 10 per cent of this land is timbered. So approximately there are over 1,000,000 acres of forest land that are being administered for $22,000. It seems to me that that is pretty cheap administration.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think the gentleman means to misrepresent or misquote me. I said that I thought there had been additions made to it.

Mr. LEVER. I did not intend to misquote the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. My statement was that the original proclamation set aside about 850,000 acres.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman from Washington when I call attention to the fact that there are over 11,000,000 acres and, according to his own statement, that 10 per cent is forest area, then there must be over 1,000,000 acres in forestry, which have been administered for $22,000—does he not think that is about as cheap administration as is possible?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What do they do?

Mr. LEVER. What do they do in any national-forest reserve? They protect it against fire, they protect it against trespassers, they see to it that the grazing permits and timber permits are given out in accordance with law, and they do all these same services that I imagine they do on every national-forest reserve.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is very much mistaken. In my State you have to protect it from fire and you have some sale of timber, but in Alaska there is no need of protection from fire and sales do not amount to sufficient to pay expenses.

Mr. MANN. Does not fire burn in Alaska?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not on this timber.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Because it is always wet.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is no place where the timber is always wet.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Delegate from Alaska stated that if this forest was saturated with coal oil you could not burn it.

Mr. MANN. Probably one statement is just as correct as the other.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You do not have to protect the forests of Alaska from fire, and no one pretends that you do who knows the facts.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me that we have got land up there that belongs to the United States, and we ought to protect it, and it strikes me from the statement I have just made that this area costs less money for protection than any forest reserve in the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You have a total of over 27,761,000 acres in Alaska. Is not the very purpose of putting aside such a tremendous area to show that it is very cheap, according to acreage, to protect it? Is not that one of the main purposes of these vast forest reserves in Alaska?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman has not been in control of the Government, and he does not know what the purpose is.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] propounded the interrogatory, Why was this reserve created? I have some opinions on that subject, and have heretofore expressed some of them. My opinion is that the Chugach and other reserves in Alaska were originally created in perfect good faith; whether in wisdom or not is a question. When created they covered comparatively small acreages of the more or less forested lands adjacent to the coast in southeast Alaska. Several years ago the service desired to increase its appropriations and it brought before the committee a request for an increase of about $200,000 on the basis of increased area of the forest reserves in Alaska. I said at that time that it was my opinion, and it is still my opinion, that those reserves were extended beyond all reason at that time, partly for the purpose of laying a foundation on which to ask Congress to appropriate $200,000 more, which was done, not for the administration of these Alaska reserves so increased, but for the administration of reserves within the continental boundaries of the United States. In other words, this was the extraordinary condition to which I called the attention of the House at that time, that we were asked to add $200,000 to the appropriations for the care of forest reserves within the continental boundaries of the United States because we had increased the area of the reserves in Alaska. Whatever your opinion may be, the fact remains that these Alaska reserves were increased, and immediately following the increase, which included millions of acres of lands containing no forest whatever, we were asked to increase and did increase the appropriation for the management of the reserves in the United States, based on increased acreage in Alaska. In my opinion that is one of the reasons why these reserves were increased.

There was another reason. These vast reserves are a part of the general policy of bottling up Alaska. Eleven million acres were taken in this reserve, and in all 25,000,000 acres in southeast Alaska mostly, taking in a large part of that portion of the Territory. Placing these lands in the forest reserve takes them from under the land laws and the right-of-way acts except those limited acts which apply in forest reserves. In other words, by the simple process of a presidential proclamation declaring that land containing no forest is forest, you can repeal all of the land laws and repeal all of the right-of-way acts except to the limited extent to which land and right-of-way acts, entirely within the discretionary power of the Secretary of Agriculture, apply within forest reserves.

[The time of Mr. MONDELL having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Under these acts no rights of way can be secured which are not revocable in the discretion of the Secretary granting them, except for a very few purposes. Therefore, through this process of extending forest reserves over vast areas in Alaska, the land laws cease to operate, and the right-of-way acts cease to operate except in this very limited way. Men desiring to secure locations for business find it practically impossible to do so except under leases revocable at will.

Mr. LAMB. May I ask my colleague if he is in favor of the amendment to strike this out?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is more or less immaterial whether you strike it out or not. I agree with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that there is not any reason why we should pay salaries to protect areas that contain no forests; or so far as they do, contain forests of a character that ought to be opened to the use of the people of the community for their local needs. There is not any reason on earth why this forest reserve should be maintained, and in my opinion it never would have been enlarged except that it first gave an excuse for increasing the appropriations elsewhere, and second—and perhaps that is the more compelling reason—that it practically bottled up all of the resources of this enormous area, larger than many of the States of the Union.

Mr. LAMB. Does the gentleman happen to know whether or not in this area there are any mines or minerals or anything valuable under the ground?

Mr. MONDELL. So far as mines are concerned, so far as they exist, their exploration can be carried on, somewhat hampered, but it can be carried on. It does not make so much difference to the miner, except it makes it more difficult for him to secure timber for his mines and more difficult to secure title. Other than that, men seeking location for themselves—men seeking rights of various sorts for industrial purposes and for development—are greatly hampered.

Mr. LAMB. But the evidence of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is that the whole thing is not worth 25 cents or a button.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I take it that somewhere on this great domain some one some time might want to do something, and if they do—and I have no doubt they will—they will find themselves hampered by a law which does in fact repeal the land laws and does repeal all of the right-of-way acts except those limited acts which apply within forest reserves.

Mr. LAMB. What would be the effect directly of the approval of this amendment and the striking out of this forest?

Mr. MONDELL. The thing to do is to get your new administration to wipe out this forest reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Joe National Forest, Idaho, $45,324.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee why a large increase over the appropriation of last year is carried in this paragraph. I refer to the St. Joe National Forest, Nev. There was appropriated last year $27,624, and this year there is an appropriation of $45,324.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman what the Forester says. He says that larger timber sales are now in progress in this forest than in any other forest in this district. The heavy cut is practically all in fire-killed timber, which must be removed within the next year or two if it is to be salvaged. Especially good men are needed in the administration of these sales because of defects resulting from the fire. Both this year and last it was necessary to secure the Secretary's approval for an increase to this forest exceeding the limitations of the appropriation plus 10 per cent. Of the above increase about $10,000 will be required for the wages of scalers. The timber cut on this forest is expected to reach its maximum next year, probably 50,000,000 feet of lumber. The remainder of the increase is needed for future sales. They are selling great quantities of lumber in that forest.

Mr. FOWLER. Do the men in charge of this forest have charge of the inspection and the sale of the lumber?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And the measurement thereof?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; and he says $10,000 will be required for the wages of scalers who measure this lumber.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wichita National Forest, Okla., $3,800.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the semicolon, at the end of line 17, on page 33, add the following:

"And not to exceed $2,000 may be expended in the erection of a headquarters building."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think both gentlemen are entirely within their rights as far as this being subject to a point of order is concerned, but I think the facts will appeal to them in such a way that they will let it be allowed, notwithstanding.

I can not do better than to read a short letter from the department, although I am entirely familiar with the facts myself. I read a letter of February 10 from the Forest Service:

SUPERVISION APPROPRIATION, 1914.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
FOREST SERVICE,
Washington, February 10, 1913.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FERRIS: You letter of February 10 is received.

In reply to your inquiry, I am glad to give you the following information from the records in this office regarding the need for a headquarters building on the Wichita National Forest. The building now occupied by Acting Supervisor Rush is an old log house of one room with a small lean-to attacament. This building is in such a dilapidated condition as to be unfit for habitation, and because of the decayed condition of the material of which it is constructed it would be a waste of money to attempt any substantial repairs. During the last year the district forester planned to replace the present building with a new one, but was unable to construct the necessary building within the $650 limitation imposed by existing legislation. It would be possible to erect this building during the next fiscal year without increasing the amount carried by the bill making appropriations for the Forest Service, but it can not be done until the $650 restriction is removed. The Forest Service will be very glad to secure authority for the construction of a building out of the regular appropriation at a cost not to exceed $2,000. This would permit the construction on the site of the present building of a substantial six-room structure, which will be sufficient for present and future needs.

The need for a building costing more than the average ranger cabin is due to the unusual character of this forest, in which is included the Wichita National Game Preserve. As you are aware from personal observation on the ground, the need for these headquarters is somewhat greater than on other forests, owing to the fact that there is in the immediate vicinity of the headquarters a large herd of buffalo, maintained under special authority of Congress, together with other varieties of game, such as elk, deer, and wild turkeys. The location of the supervisor close to these animals is absolutely necessary. This attraction brings to the headquarters a very large number of visitors, who desire to view the buffalo and other animals. Congress has already provided a large amount of money for the erection of fences and other buildings on the Wichita National Forest for the necessary care and protection of these animals, and the construction of the permanent headquarters is simply a necessary addition to the equipment for their maintenance.

Very truly, yours,

H. S. GRAVES, Forester.

Mr. Chairman, the letter and the facts in substance amount to this: There is a game preserve and a forest reserve on 58,000 acres of land in my own home county in Oklahoma. I go there oftentimes every summer. I am familiar with the forest and the status of things out there. The forester lives in a little one-roomed log cabin, and the logs are rotted off at the corners. The Forestry Service has been trying for two or three years to build a house to serve the purpose out there and you can not do it, where you have to haul the lumber 25 miles and take carpenters out and board them, for $650.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there anything to prevent the man from building another log house where the ends are not rotted off?

Mr. FERRIS. No; but I think the gentleman will agree in the face of existing circumstances that it will be hardly the thing to do to build another log house in this day and age since we have also made it a game preserve. I hope the chairman will let the amendment pass; it does not increase the bill at all, but merely allows this to be taken from the amount which is now in the bill. It, in fact, only relaxes a harsh rule of limitation of $650 per house.

Mr. LAMB. I would be very glad to relieve the situation and let my colleague from Oklahoma have his amendment if I could possibly do so, and I think if the gentleman had come before the committee and made the suggestion we would have found some remedy for this evil, but now we are bound to insist on the point of order. I think we will find a remedy hereafter.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Wyoming National Forest, Wyo., $7,170.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how the total for the care of these forest reserves compares with the total of the bill of last year?

Mr. LAMB. I do not think there is any increase; I am satisfied it is the same as last year. The total lump sum is apportioned among these different forests by the Forester himself.

Mr. MONDELL. The appropriation this year for this purpose is not totaled in the bill, but, if I am correct in a rather hurried addition and subtraction, it is less than it was last year. In other words, the service has modified these items, and in modifying them has brought about a reduction in the total of the expenditures on the forest reserves. In doing that there have been some increases and a considerable number of decreases, necessarily, in order to bring about the net decrease, and I am very glad that no gentleman having reserves in his State has felt called upon to question the reduction in the cost of the service on such reserves, because we must admit, it seems to me, that the Forest Service in making these estimates of the necessary expenditure for superintendents, for rangers, and all that sort of thing, has carefully gone into all of the questions of the needs of the service and that they have wisely decided what is needed. On the forest reserves in my State there is a reduction. Some items have been increased, some have been reduced, and I am assuming that those increases and reductions have been wisely made. The chairman will recall that I called his attention to the fact of these changes before the committee took up the bill for consideration and asked that they investigate the matter fully and determine so far as they could the wisdom and propriety of these changes. I think the fact that changes have been made in practically every one of these cases indicates that the service and the committee have carefully considered the needs of the service and are endeavoring to keep the expenditures as low as possible consistent with the good of the service. I trust they have not made the sums too low in any case. We must and do depend on them in the matter.

Mr. LAMB. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, and he must allow me to thank him.

The Clerk read as follows:

Zuni National Forest, N. Mex. and Ariz., $3,734.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That it is hereby made one of the duties of each officer under the Forest Service while working in the field to make investigations for ferreting out and prevention of offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests and make full report thereof to the forest supervisor of the district.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. I wish the gentleman would withhold that.

Mr. LAMB. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done after the reading of the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional national forests created or to be created under section 11 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat., 963), and lands under contract for purchase or for the acquisition of which condemnation proceedings have been instituted for the purposes of said act, $57,590.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAMB. Would the gentleman object to coming closer? We can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I will permit him to hear before I get through if I have the time. In regard to the last amendment, it is one which seems to me ought to go into this bill at some place. The permittees for these various national forests are paying large sums of money for the purpose of running their stock upon the ranges.

And the various forest rangers, while doing their work over the range, on horseback, afoot, or otherwise, ought to be required to observe the strangers and interlopers in these forests, to the end that they should report strange men and strange conditions to the supervisors, and in turn to the local authorities, so that these people paying this rent might have some knowledge and information and some protection against those who are driving their horses and cattle away. It is nothing but fair and right that such protection should be given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I introduced on December 12, 1912, H. R. 27145, covering this subject, which was referred to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I hold in my hand a copy of the resolution of the Alturas Stock Association of the Modoc Forest Reserve in relation to that matter, showing the need and necessity for some action that would require and compel joint action in regard to the forest officers as to reserves.

And I ask, therefore, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD this letter, together with the resolutions of the stock association.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following are the resolutions and letters referred to:

Resolutions of the Alturas Stock Association.

Whereas the Hon JOHN E. RAKER, Member of Congress, has introduced a bill (H. R. 27142) in the House of Representatives, appropriating the sum of $5,000 to be used for determining the best methods of ferreting out offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests, and for other purposes; and

Whereas the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, has written a letter to the Hon. JOHN LAMB, of the Committee on Agriculture, a copy of which is attached to these resolutions, denouncing the bill as useless, in that the ground covered by the said bill is already covered by law of ample scope, and that the duty of protecting private property, even upon the said forests, properly falls within the province of the State, and for other reasons herein set out and answered below; and

Whereas it appears that the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, and the various officers serving under him intrusted with the management and government of the said national forests, have failed to grasp the purport of the said bill, and the contention of the old Modoc County Stock Association referred to in the letter, in that it appears that the said officers seem to have conceived the idea that the said bill contemplates, and the said stock association desired, that the officers of the Forest Service should assume the duties of the State or county constabulary and sheriffs, or other executive officers, in the enforcement of the said laws; and

Whereas the said stock association had in view only that the duties of the Forest Service should be extended to include the detection of the theft of live stock, and the securing of evidence to be turned over to the local county or State officers for their use in enforcing the local laws sufficient to convict the thieves upon the national forests, and that special officers peculiarly fitted for the work should be employed for the purpose, and no other; and the bill referred to has for its object an inquiry to determine to what extent the theft of live stock exists upon the national forests; to what extent, if it does so exist, local officers of the national forests are assisting in its detection; to determine if it is practicable for them to do more; and if so, to determine the best way for the service to proceed to give such assistance in the detection of the theft of live stock upon the national forests; and

Whereas it is not the duty of any county or State officer to go into the lonely recesses of the ranges and there to act as a detective in the ferreting out of a crime, the existence of which is suspected but not known, either within or without the national forests located within the respective county or State, his prescribed duties, in the main, being the arresting and trying of accused persons upon warrants sworn to and evidence furnished by others; and

Whereas the Forest Service through its present organization for managing and caring for grazing within the respective forests is better equipped for handling successfully the detection of the crime of the theft of live stock within the national forests than would be any organization that the county or State may ever hope to effect for the purpose; and

Whereas the honorable Secretary makes the technical assertion in the above-mentioned letter that "the duty of preventing crimes against private property falls properly within the province of the States, and I question whether the Federal Government should endeavor to assume a part or all of the duty," and a little farther along in his letter, after quoting a Federal law to sustain him, he says, "Under this law forest officers have been directed to cooperate freely with the local officials in the enforcement of the laws of each of the States and the local regulations promulgated under authority of such laws." In the one paragraph he questions his right to do a thing, and in the other he says that he has done it under warrant of law. He further says that "the present plan of" Federal "cooperation" with State or county officials "has been almost uniformly harmonious, and has been productive of excellent results." Further along in his letter he says "The loss of stock by theft within the national forests has been so reduced by the watchfulness and the cooperation of the local forest officers that it is much less than the loss occurring upon the unreserved public lands outside of the boundaries of the national forests." It appears to us that the honorable Secretary himself, in so far as the theft of live stock upon the national forests is concerned, has answered that part of his letter in which he asserts that the "duty of preventing crimes against private property falls properly within the province of the State." The part that the forest officers are now taking in the detection of the crime of theft of live stock upon the national forests, whatever that may be, has worked well, and the honorable Secretary is pleased with it and appears to be satisfied to stop short right where he is, notwithstanding that he admits in his letter that the thieving of live stock still continues upon the national forests. He says that it has only been reduced, and from the tone of his letter one would be led to believe that the theft of live stock within the national forests before the cooperation which he refers to was of very common occurrence, which we feel to be the case. Then, if the cooperation has worked well as far as it has gone—and the honorable Secretary says that it has—what is to hinder its working better if it should go a step further? We naturally wonder if the department pulled back at the initial step.

The bill under discussion aims at an investigation having for its object the preventing of theft upon the national forests. At the same time that the honorable Secretary states that the theft of live stock has been much reduced, he admits that it still exists, for he says that it has only been reduced. Surely he does not want to be understood as opposing a measure having for its object the finding of a means for further reducing, or stopping altogether, such thefts. What harm can possibly come from an independent investigation representing the side of the permittees of the national forests? Much good may come. The cooperation has worked well as far as it has gone. The honorable Secretary has said so. He also says that it should go no further. Why? The stockmen would like to be heard upon that point also. They represent one side of the issue, and it appears to us that the bill in question will afford them the best possible means to be heard. It appears to us that the honorable Secretary may be getting his information through persons that do not want to have further duties added to those that they already have. An ex-ranger of the Modoc National Forest says that it is wrong to require rangers to assist in the protection of live stock from theft within the national forest, because a thief that he may detect in the act of stealing, and report, would waylay and assassinate such a ranger. It is current report that a ranger on the Modoc National Forest last summer, during the month of July or August, saw a man thereon whom he supposed to be in the act of stealing horses. The supposed thief was driving a band of horses in a run with every indication that he was trying to avoid being seen. He and the horses soon disappeared in the brush and were not seen or heard of again. The incident was not reported until some time after, when it was too late to do anything. These incidents are mentioned to show the probable bias of the honorable Secretary's information, as well as to point out the necessity of the investigation proposed in the above-mentioned bill. If Federal cooperation has worked well, will it not work better under an organization that will furnish men for the purpose that are not afraid of performing their duty because of the danger of assassination? Should this situation not be investigated? If the Forest Service has a right to do a thing at all it certainly has the right to do it well.

Have we made it clear? Have we made the thing that we want so clear that the argument that the National Government has no right to punish those guilty of crimes committed within a national forest within a State against the permittees thereof, will ever be made to us again, for we have heard it more than once? There certainly can be no law against the National Government's pointing the finger of guilt and evidence at the one guilty of committing an offense, any offense, against the property of permittees, or otherwise, within or without the national forests. A foreigner visiting our lands for the first time has that right. That is all that the permittees want. Point the offender out and name the evidence, and then the county and State laws and the machinery for their enforcement are ample. That is where the gap lies—to find the thief and his crime. The county and State laws fall down at that point. They provide no machinery for detecting the crime of the sneaking, prowling thief that commits his crimes on the lonely and secluded ranges of the national forests away from the habitation of man.

The honorable Secretary has said that such assistance is now given; that the finger of guilt is now pointed by the employees of the Forest Service. One of the purposes of this bill is to find out to just what extent the finger is pointed, and to what extent the pointing is make-belief. Observe the incidents quoted above. Is it wrong and useless for the people to inquire into the acts of the Forest Service to see if the service can not be improved for their benefit?

There is no especial provision in any of the rules and regulations governing the management of the national forests, that we are aware of, that makes it an especial duty of anyone to point the finger. The employee in the service is only expected to point the finger when, in the daily routine of his other duties, he unexpectedly happens upon an offender in the act of committing an offense. Even seeing the evidence of the offense without the offender it is no part of his duty to trace the crime to the offender. We, therefore, believe that the finger is not pointed nearly as often as it should be; and for proof we point to the fact that many of the men formerly engaged in the live-stock industry and using the summer ranges within the Modoc National Forest for their stock have either entirely quit the business or reduced their stock to a minimum, they claiming that so many of their stock were lost during the outside summer grazing season that there was no profit in the business.

The statement of the honorable Secretary, quoted above, that "The loss of stock by theft within the national forests is much less than the loss occurring upon the unreserved public lands outside of the boundaries of the national forests," indicates very plainly that the officers of the Forest Service whose duties it is to patrol the national forests are in a better position for the detection and prevention of the theft of live stock upon the national forests than the permittees thereof, or the State and county officers intrusted with the enforcement of the local laws. If the forest officers are better organized and in a better position for the work, and those duties come within the meaning of the law, as the honorable Secretary says that they already do, why not make the detection of the theft of live stock upon the national forests one of their specific duties instead of an optional duty as it now seems to be? The law quoted says that they are to do these things whenever it is practicable. Who decides when it is practicable and when it is not practicable? Naturally, it appears to us that it is the man on the ground. Who else could it be? Who but the man who sees or knows in person of the acts of thievery? It appears that it is all left to him. The law and the instructions of the department, as set out in the letter of the honorable Secretary, tell him, virtually, "If you see a thief in the act of stealing upon the national forests, you may prevent him or you may leave him alone, just as you feel about it." If you are afraid, you may run. If you think best, you need not mention the incident at all. You are only to go as far as practicable, and it is up to you to decide when it is practicable, and when it is not practicable, to interfere with thievery that comes under your observation. In connection with this we call attention to the incidents quoted above. The Secretary says that the theft of live stock upon the ranges of the forests is less than it is upon the adjacent ranges outside of the forests, and we are convinced that his statement is correct. But is it from any active part that the rangers and the patrol of the Forest Service take in the suppression of the theft of live stock upon the forests, or is it from the mere fact that their presence upon the forests, in the performance of their daily duties, makes the secrecy of thieving a little more uncertain and thereby scares out the more timid in the vocation that the loss of live stock from that source is reduced?

The law says that the officials of the Forest Service may prevent the theft of live stock upon the national forests; the Secretary of Agriculture tells them so, too; but who tells them that they must? Who knows how much more good might be done if the detection of the theft of live stock upon the national forests was made a specific duty of the forest officials instead of an optional duty? Who knows to what greater extent the thieving of live stock might be stopped if at least one patrol skilled in the detection of the theft of live stock, whose sole duties are to look after its live-stock interests, were placed upon the national forests? The object of the bill under discussion is to make an impartial investigation that will settle these points as they should be rightfully settled. And yet we are told that there is no occasion for it.

The honorable Secretary further says that, naturally, there are occasional requests from permittees for protection from losses by theft; but only upon one national forest has there been any concerted demand for more rigid enforcement of State laws by local forest officers. This does not argue that there is not a great need in all of the forests for a better way for the detection of the theft of live stock upon such forests. He only says that the demand was not made. More than likely the permittees in other forests than the Modoc thought that there was no use, and therefore did not urge the matter. The nature of the correspondence of the Forest Service upon these matters, while courteous, was not such as to encourage the presentation of such matters to it a second time. Probably the thickness of its skin accounts for the persistence of the old Modoc County Association and its successor, the Alturas Stock Association. Any requests at all from permittees for protection from losses by theft upon the national forests indicate that the theft exists there, but it does not indicate to what extent it exists.

In answer to the latter part of the letter, will say that it is not a question of the adequacy of the laws, either county or national, that is needed to stop the theft of live stock upon the national forests. The law is ample. It is the catching of the thief with evidence sufficient to convict; that is the point. The next best thing to catching him is to make him think that he will be caught and convicted if he commits the thefts, and thereby scare him out.

The honorable Secretary, in closing, says: "I feel that the present plan of cooperation, which has worked out so satisfactorily upon other national forests, should be equally adequate with the Modoc Forest, and that the present instructions mark the limit to which the Federal officers should go in the enforcement of State laws for the protection of private property." The attention of the honorable Secretary is called to the fact that he bases his statement of the fact that the plan of cooperation has worked out so satisfactorily upon other national forests than the Modoc upon the fact that not many permittees upon other forests than the Modoc have asked for special patrol to operate against stock thieves upon the national forests. May we ask what opportunity have such permittees had to express themselves upon the matter? We feel that we have fully answered these final statements in the letter of the Secretary in answering other parts of his letter, and to answer them here would be but to repeat.

Resolutions relating to the grazing of live stock upon the Modoc National Forest and the need of special patrol thereof, adopted by the advisory board of the Alturas Stock Association on February 28, 1912, and afterwards approved by the association, are attached to and made a part of these resolutions. Now, therefore,

Resolved, That, for the reasons herein above set out, it is the unqualified belief of this executive board of the Alturas Stock Association that the said bill is asking for an investigation that is necessary, and that, if vigorously carried out, should prepare the way for filling an existing gap which is proving unusually difficult to bridge in the execution of the laws in regard to the theft of live stock upon the national forests, and should lead to much good: And be it further

Resolved, That we hereby extend to the Hon. JOHN E. RAKER, Member of Congress, our earnest approval of his efforts in behalf of the interests of the permittees of the national forests holding grazing privileges thereon, and ask that he vigorously and as incessantly as decency will permit urge the passage of the said bill.

Adopted by the executive board of the Alturas Stock Association on this 23d day of January, in the year 1913.

Resolutions by the advisory board of the Alturas Stock Association.

Whereas the live-stock industry of Modoc County, by reason of its valleys, which provide winter quarters and are surrounded by large summer grazing areas that are rocky, broken, precipitous, and mountainous, and suited to no other uses, and never will be, than that of grazing and of timber, is the principal source of its revenues; and

Whereas the grazing lands lying within the national forest of the county are of greater permanent value to its citizens than the forests lying within the same, adding, as they do, a steady annual revenue to the resources of the county, which will continue for untold ages to come; and

Whereas the fees for the grazing of live stock upon the Modoc National Forest amounted to about 86 per cent of its total revenues in the year 1911, a very small part of which was expended by the service in protecting the grazing interests of its permittees and enforcing the rules and regulations established by law and the Forest Service for the proper management and control of the grazing areas lying within the said national forest; and

Whereas the officers and employees of the said Modoc National Forest do not seem to have the time necessary to look after the grazing interests therein, to protect the permittees in their rights, and to enforce the laws, rules, and regulations established for the management and control of the grazing areas thereof to give equal justice alike to all holders of grazing permits; and

Whereas the service does not, and can not, properly regulate grazing within the said Modoc National Forest, and protect the ranges therein from trespass and usurpation by large stock owners who can get a permit to range thereon only a portion of their stock and graze, or are expected to graze, the remainder on ranges adjacent thereto; by stockmen who do not hold permits and manage to slip their stock onto the reserve at remote and unfrequented places; by men who have no stock upon the reserves, but ride the ranges thereon and drive stock therefrom for the purpose of theft, without men in the employ of the service, during the summer grazing season, whose sole duty is to look after the grazing and handling of livestock upon the said national forest, and nothing else; and

Whereas the average loss of stock on the summer ranges should not exceed 2 per cent of the total number turned thereon, the real loss amounts, in many instances, to as much as 10 per cent, for which reason many of the smaller stockmen have quit the business; and

Whereas the principal infractions complained of above occur during the months of July, August, and September, at which time the stockmen generally are busy taking care of their crops, and the routine work of the forest rangers does not take them onto that part of the range within the reserve where the above unlawful acts complained of are committed, they being off, in many instances, patrolling the forests to detect and put out fires. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That, for the reasons hereinabove set out, it is the sense of the advisory board of the Alturas Stock Association that the Forest Service should furnish an adequate number of rangers during the summer grazing season, whose sole duty is to look after grazing on the Modoc National Forest, and nothing else, to put a stop to the trespasses and wrongs above set out and complained of; and

Resolved, That it appears to this board that the members of this association holding grazing permits on the reserve are not getting value received for the money that they pay for such permits, in that a large part of the money paid for such permits is used for other purposes while the things needed to be done to protect and promote the grazing interests of the reserve above set out are left undone; and

Resolved, That it appears to us that the authority to put a stop to the things above complained of does not lie with the permittees, but with those intrusted with the enforcement of the regulations and laws made for the management of the reserves, an important branch of which, the grazing of live stock, is given but little attention in the field, apparently being attended to only when the rangers can be spared from the doing of other things.

Resolution approved and adopted by the advisory board of the Alturas Stock Association February 28, 1912.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 28, 1912.

Hon. JOHN LAMB,
Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

DEAR CAPT. LAMB: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 17, inclosing a copy of the bill (H. R. 27142) to make an appropriation for experiments and investigations and determining methods for the ferreting out and preventing of offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests, and for other purposes. The bill also provides that the money to be appropriated shall be used from the funds collected from the permits granted to permittees within the national forests.

I know of no reason why it is necessary for Congress to appropriate $5,000 for the purposes specified in this bill. The United States Government has ample means and ample authority of law to prevent crimes against the property of the United States Government, both within the national forests and outside, and for this purpose no further legislation now appears to be necessary. The duty of preventing crimes against private property falls properly within the province of the State, and I question whether the Federal Government should endeavor to assume a part or all of the duty, except in rare instances where its assistance is required by the State. In so far as the protection of private property within the national forests is concerned, there is no State which requires the assistance of the United States Government beyond the extent to which such assistance is now rendered. In the appropriation act of May 23, 1908 (35 Stat., 259), Congress provided that—

"Hereafter officials of the Forest Service designated by the Secretary of Agriculture shall in all ways that are practicable aid in the enforcement of the laws of the States or Territories with regard to stock" * * *.

Under this law forest officers have been directed to cooperate freely with the local officials in the enforcement of the laws of each of the States and the local regulations promulgated under authority of such laws. The present plan of cooperation has been almost uniformly harmonious and has been productive of excellent results.

The loss of stock by theft within the national forests has been so reduced by the watchfulness and the cooperation of the local forest officers that it is much less than the loss occurring upon the unreserved public lands outside of the boundaries of the national forests, and realizing this fact, the majority of the permittees have not expressed any desire for the further extension of authority now possessed by the forest officers. Naturally there are occasional requests from permittees for protection from losses by theft, but the records of the Forest Office show that upon only one national forest has there been any concerted demand for the more rigid enforcement of State laws by local forest officers. This demand arises within the Modoc National Forest, which is situated in the extreme northern end of the State of California. A number of petitions and communications have been received from permittees within that forest, which expresses the belief that since the Government charges a fee for the grazing of cattle upon the forest lands, it is incumbent upon the Government to protect the cattle from theft during the period that they occupy the forest lands under permit. It is the understanding that the State laws and local regulations effective within the Modoc Forest are fully as adequate to protect the owners of livestock from losses by theft as the laws and regulations effective within the remainder of the national forests. I feel that the present plan of cooperation, which has worked out so satisfactorily upon other national forests, should be equally adequate within the Modoc Forest, and that the present instructions mark the limit to which Federal officers should go in the enforcement of State laws for the protection of private property.

For the reasons given above, I do not favor the passage of the bill.

Very sincerely, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be opened to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That not to exceed $35,000 of this sum may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for the examination, survey, and platting of certain lands now listed or to be listed within national forests chiefly valuable for agriculture and describing such lands by metes and bounds, as required by the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 233), and the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat., p. 1095), and hereafter such surveys, and the plats and field notes thereof, shall be made by employees of the Forest Service, to be designated by the United States surveyor general, and such surveys and the plats and field notes thereof shall be approved by the United States surveyor general.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "general," line 20, page 34, the following:

"Provided further, That any unexpended balance of an appropriation of $35,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for survey and lease of lands within the forest reserves, chiefly valuable for agriculture, and describing the same by metes and bounds or otherwise, etc., provided by the act of August 10, 1912, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913,' be, and the same is hereby, continued and made available for and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for the purpose of this appropriation."

Mr. LAMB. I accept that. It is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how long the Secretary of Agriculture has been segregating these national forests?

Mr. MANN. That item, as it stands, appears in the current law for the first time.

Mr. LAMB. It came in the bill last year by conference with the Senate, I think. It was put in by the Senate, and we agreed to it in conference.

Mr. FOWLER. The last bill carried an appropriation of $25,000 for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. Thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. FOWLER. No; $25,000.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is right. It is $25,000.

Mr. LAMB. While this is apparently a new item, it is the same in amount and substantially the same in language as provided in the current law for the proper execution of the acts of June 11, 1906, and March 3, 1909, and has been combined with this subappropriation for the convenience of administration. The appropriation will give the Forest Service authority to make the first survey when the land is located for the settler, and which, when approved by the surveyor general, will avoid a second survey. The actual increase is only $40,000.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill last year carried an appropriation of $25,000, as is carried after the proviso in this bill. Now, in addition to that, there is $100,000 carried in this bill.

Mr. LAMB. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FOWLER. For the purpose of segregating, this bill carries $75,000 more than was carried last year.

Mr. MANN. I just explained that. There was an increase for the purpose of carrying out that law. The actual increase is only $40,000.

Mr. FOWLER. The actual increase, as I understand, is $75,000.

Mr. MANN. The proviso takes the place of an omitted item in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not understand why there should be a larger appropriation this year than was made last year.

Mr. MANN. That is an increase of only $40,000.

Mr. LEVER. The appropriation last year was only $60,000, and we have increased it to $100,000.

Mr. FOWLER. What appears to be the necessity for this additional $40,000?

Mr. LEVER. The department is very anxious, indeed, and I think the people of the country are very anxious, to have these agricultural lands segregated in order that they may be thrown open to homestead entry. Rather than bottling them up in the national forests, we want to make progress in selecting agricultural lands and then opening them up according to law.

Mr. FOWLER. The main object of this appropriaton is to segregate the agricultural land from that which is not subject to agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. Exactly.

Mr. FOWLER. In order to open it up for homestead settlement?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; to homestead entry.

Mr. FOWLER. For those who have no homes?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. The sum inserted in the last year was a tentative sum, and since that time they have been examining the magnitude of the problem, and they have come to the conclusion that it would be more economical to make a large one and have it all done as soon as possible.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and maintenance of necessary field, office, and laboratory supplies, instruments, and equipment, $155,000.

Mr. RAKER. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, as a new paragraph, after line 25, page 34:

"For experiments and investigations and determining methods for the ferreting out and prevention of offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests, $5,000: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be used from the funds collected from the permits granted to permittees within the national forests."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] makes a point of order against the amendment. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of methods for wood distillation and for the preservative treatment of timber, for timber testing, and the testing of such woods as may require test to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, and for other investigations and experiments to promote economy in the use of forest products, $100,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. This item in the current law carried $170,000. It is reduced in the present bill to $100,000. I appreciate the reasons which actuated the committee in making the reduction; but this item covers the expenditure for the study of wood in the making of paper, particularly print paper, and I am informed that if the item remains at $100,000 it means the abandonment of the laboratory at Wausau, Wis., where the Government has been carrying on these experiments.

In this country we are now in that condition where, being dependent upon the supply of spruce wood for the manufacture of print paper, our supply is decreasing annually, and the manufacturers of paper are going over to Canada and establishing their mills there, where the spruce supply is practically unlimited. We are threatened with a removal by the manufacturers of the print paper mills in this country to the other side of the line.

The laboratory at Wausau, Wis., is doing effective work, and has shown that it is practicable to make news print paper out of other kinds of wood, such as jack pine and other varieties that are adapted to that purpose. They are making interesting experiments, but those experiments are not yet complete.

I desire to read to the committee a letter from Mr. John Norris, who is the chairman of the committee on paper of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and who, from his point of view, representing his side, is undoubtedly the best-posted man in the country on the subject. I asked him a short time ago, after this bill was reported, to investigate this matter and see whether, from the point of view of the publishers of newspapers, they thought it was desirable to continue these experiments, because they have to pay for the paper in the end. I hold in my hand this letter from Mr. Norris:

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION, OFFICE OF THE COMMITTEE ON PAPER,
New York, January 24, 1913.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANN: In the matter of Wausau Laboratory, I visited Mr. LAMB, Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and Mr. Graves, Chief of the Forestry Service. The expenses of maintaining the Wausau experiments range from $15,000 to $20,000 a year payment by the United States Government. The committee on Agriculture has reduced the lump item for testing purposes from $170,000 to $100,000. The anticipation of the Forestry Service is that, if the appropriation is kept at $100,000, the experimental work at Wausau will be discontinued.

I have received a copy of a report of Mr. Thickens, in charge of the experimental work at Wausau, entitled "Experiments with jack pine and hemlock for mechanical pulp," issued June 11, 1912, in the Forest Products Laboratory series. I have read Mr. Thickens's report carefully and I fail to find much encouragement for a commercial substitute for spruce. However, I expect to visit Wausau next week and will advise you further with respect to that situation.

Yours, truly,

JOHN NORRIS,
Chairman of Committee on Paper.

Then I asked him to go to Wausau, which he proposes to do. He communicated with me again, but I do not have his letter here, urging that these experiments be continued. The question now arising is in the main a question as to color. They find that after their experiments they are able to make cheaper paper out of white pine by the ground-wood process, but the color is off.

They find that after their experiment they are able to make cheap paper out of jack pine by the ground-wood process. But the color is off. I am satisfied that if these experiments can be continued a few years longer we will be able to use a large amount of the soft woods, which are now practically valueless, for the making of the news print paper, instead of in the end being compelled to buy from Canada. I hope that the gentleman will not oppose an amendment which I offer, to make the sum $120,000 instead of $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the pro forma amendment and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 6, strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$120,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, to show that the Committee on Agriculture had this matter carefully in hand, when we had Mr. Graves before us I asked him this question on this appropriation of $170,000:

The CHAIRMAN. Right there, Mr. Graves, may I ask this question: This is in great part technical and scientific, and when we have found out how this distillation of Douglas fir and other western fir timber, and so forth, can be done, is there an end to that? Is there not a time when that sort of thing should reach its ultimate result?

Mr. GRAVES. There are such a multitude of problems of the better utilization of the products of our forests that it will be a long time before we have them all solved. We will solve one after another. Take, for instance, the question of the drying of lumber. There is an enormous waste to-day through imperfect drying of lumber, and we have developed a new dry kiln, which through experiments so far is showing a large reduction in that waste. When we have perfected that about all that is necessary for us to do on that particular line of work will have been done; but I could not say that we are going to exhaust the field of things necessary to find out for the best use of what our forests produce.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you do this work—where is this $170,000 expended?

Mr. GRAVES. The headquarters of this is at Madison, Wis., where the laboratory is established.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the bulk of this money spent right there?

Mr. GRAVES. The bulk of this money is spent there. We have some of the work in Washington, and a representative of the branch is here to assist me in the direction of the work, and then we have men in the field; we have representatives of that branch assisting in our national forest timber sales.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in 1909 these appropriations for general expenses in this department were all in a lump sum and embraced $3,986,000. The appropriation of that year, when the segregation was made for this work, was $129,420. When we increased it the next year to $170,000 I, as ranking member of the minority on that occasion, urged that it should stand as it was and insisted that it should, but it was increased to $170,000. This year there came a recommendation from the department for $170,000. We considered it carefully, and thought, in view of the fact that some of these experiments were purely technical and that an end ought to come at some time, we would reduce the amount; but in view of the fact that the first appropriation was $129,000, and as the gentleman from Illinois seems to have investigated this subject, I am willing to agree to the amendment asked for by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. With the understanding that the $20,000 is for the purpose of continuing these experiments?

Mr. LAMB. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows.

For experiments and investigations of range conditions within national forests, and of methods for improving the range by reseeding, regulation of grazing, and other means, $20,180.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "forests," in line 8, page 35, the following: "Experiments and investigations and determining methods for the ferreting out and prevention of offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests."

Mr. LAMB. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. After reading the provision you will notice that the matter beginning in line 7 relates to general range conditions. It is—

For experiments and investigations of range conditions,

That is general.

To direct the officers to do certain things would be germane under that section. Again, "the regulation of grazing is in that section and other means." The object of the amendment is to specify what some of those other means are relative to the range conditions in a national forest. I believe, without going into the merits of the amendment, that the amendment is not subject to a point of order under this particular paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, not having examined the amendment closely, but from listening to it, I think it must be apparent to the Chair that it is new legislation. It seems to me that the gentleman is trying to write a criminal statute into this bill, and I think it is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is as far from being a criminal statute as any language can be. The forest supervisor has control of the ranges. He is making an investigation and experiment as to the conditions, as to the regulation of grazing and other means; and I call your attention to the fact that if a man is within the forest reserve with stock for which he has no permit, whether he is only driving them across or not, one of the duties is or ought to be, relating to the condition of that range, to try and find out what that man is doing. The only purpose of this amendment is to have a supervisor of the rangers report these men that are using the range without permission. Here is an extent of territory 40 miles square. They have control of it. These rangers know who have permits on that range, and if they see a strange man, with cattle or horses 10 or 15 or 20 in number, they ought to report to the Forest Service. They do not report, saying it is none of their business, as a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture will show. They do not report because they are afraid of the men that are driving the cattle there.

When they come into the supervisors to make their report, and in turn for the supervisor to report to the legal authorities, these men should be directed to report to the supervisor. These permittees have been complaining, and they have a right to complain. They have been paying their money; they are willing and ready to pay it, but they believe the officers of the range ought to make the report; but, as I say, the reason that they do not make it is because they are afraid of the fellows on the range. That is all we ask.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, without discussing the merits of the proposition, I desire to call the Chair's attention to the language of the bill:

For experiments and investigations of range conditions within national forests, and of methods for improving the range by reseeding, regulation of grazing, and other means.

It seems to me that the latter part of the item sets out very clearly what is intended to be done, and certainly the amendment of the gentleman from California is a change of the item to such an extent as to make it subject to a point of order as new legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from California has shown that he has forestry officers that ought to be discharged.

Mr. RAKER. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. The legislation that he proposes is clearly new, radical, and revolutionary and would not necessarily cure the condition that he has in mind. The reading of the amendment as I caught it would authorize the Agricultural Department to ferret out any sort of offense committed against permittees. As the gentleman from South Carolina has well said, they are proposing to enact a criminal statute or to give authority to investigate any sort of a crime or misdemeanor occurring on forest reserves provided it is perpetrated against permittees.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman wants to be fair. This amendment relates to the property of the permittee and for which he has a permit.

Mr. MONDELL. It is certainly new legislation, and places the Forestry Service officials under obligation to pursue a man who might commit a larceny of the property of the permittee, where some one might steal his sheep dog or drive off a calf. It provides that the forestry officers shall ferret out all offenses against the property of the permittee. A man might set fire to his house and, under the amendment, the forestry officers would be compelled to find out who committed the crime. It would not only be new legislation but unwise legislation. The protection which the gentleman desires permittees to have, they now have. I have had some little experience in forestry matters, and this is the first time I ever heard it suggested that the Forestry Service did not protect the permittee in use of the range. The complaint usually is that they are a little bit too drastic in their operations in protecting him against those unauthorized on the reserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This amendment by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is to authorize a portion of the appropriation contained in this paragraph to be used for the purpose of—ferreting out and prevention of offenses committed against the property of permittees within the national forests.

It appears to the Chair that it is certainly not authorized by any existing law and will be entirely new legislation, and in addition to that would not be germane to this particular paragraph. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of tree seed, cones, and nursery stock, for seeding and tree planting within national forests, and for experiments and investigations necessary for such seeding and tree planting, $165,640: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may procure such seed, cones, and nursery stock by open purchase without advertisements for proposals, whenever in his discretion such method is most economical and in the public interest, and when the cost thereof will not exceed $500.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Has the chairman any statement in the hearings where they have planted any of these seed in California?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I think not. I will tell the gentleman directly. It is the same amount that was carried last year.

Mr. RAKER. Where were they planted? Does the report show?

Mr. LAMB. They cover about 30,000 acres a year.

Mr. RAKER. Where?

Mr. LAMB. In the different forests. I do not know that the report shows where.

Mr. RAKER. I am very much interested in the conservation of these barren hills. I have been going over a good deal of the Western States, and some of my friends have asked me if I could not send them the information where these trees were planted. I thought I would be able to get the information here, so that they would know that their money was being properly expended.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can tell the gentleman just where this replanting is going on, but this appropriation is primarily for the reforestation of denuded lands in the national forests. It furnishes a large part of the cost of maintaining 31 nurseries and collecting and purchasing 75,000 pounds of tree seed and planting from 20 to 30 acres annually.

Mr. RAKER. Then, presumably, for the present they are using the larger part in getting the nurseries in shape so they can set the trees out later.

Mr. LEVER. That is true, and they are reforesting the denuded lands.

The Clerk read as follows:

For silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments and investigations independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States, and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forests and forest lands, $83,728.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$83,728" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 35, line 24, by striking out "$83,728" and inserting "$100,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is the same appropriation as we carried last year, the same wording, and the same amount asked for by the department.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the chairman that that sum is not sufficient. For illustration, in Colorado it cost $300,000 last year to administer the forest reserves. They obtained from the grazing privilege and sale of timber only $210,000, or $90,000 short of expenses. Therefore, we ought to have an additional appropriation in order to make our State even up with the others on the matter of expenditure. I was in doubt whether to ask for a decrease or an increase, but as soon as I ran across the figures that we are running behind $90,000 a year in Colorado alone, to say nothing about the other States, I hoped to awaken sympathy on the part of this House against this forest reserve policy. We, in Colorado, believe that not a tree should be removed from our forests. They are necessary for the proper conservation of our water supply. Our trees only grow three months in the year and only six hours in a day. I will ask in this connection to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Rocky Mountain News, printed a few days ago on this identical subject, and which gives the official figures. In the same connection, as long as I see that the news zephyrs are ladened with a conservatism concerning this conservation policy coming eastward from the West, I desire to put in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The newspaper clippings referred to are as follows:

FIGHT LAUNCHED ON LAND POLICY—AMMONS LEADS PROTEST AGAINST ORDER TO CHARGE HOMESTEADERS FOR RESERVE TIMBER—COMMERCIAL BODIES TO AID—ORGANIZATIONS THROUGHOUT STATE ARE ASKED TO OPPOSE PINCHOT CONSERVATION SYSTEM.

Gov. Ammons and several anti-Pinchot conservation policy advocates decided yesterday to urge every commercial body in the State to get into the fight against the order of the Forestry Department to charge homesteaders for timber from the forestry reserves.

The order says that settlers will be charged for timber just enough to cover the cost of supervision, but is taken by Coloradoans opposed to the Pinchot policy to mean that settlers necessarily must pay more for such timber than the market prices for lumber in cities and towns with transportation facilities.

"The forestry department makes a virtue of every necessity; and it has never granted a single concession except at the end of a fight," declared Gov. Ammons in a meeting in the capitol yesterday.

The Government's figures show that under the old order the cost of supervision in Colorado in the last fiscal year ran more than $300,000, while the income from the sale of timber and leasing of forest lands was only $210,000. Homesteaders under the new order, it is declared, will be expected to make up such deficits. Originally settlers were given a certain amount of timber gratis; later the permit system was adopted, granting each settler $20 worth of timber.

Commercial bodies throughout the State will be urged to back up the victory gained by Ammons and his associates after years of fighting in forcing the Government to throw open for settlement 85,000 acres of land in the White River Reserve.

The releasing of this land, it is declared, indicates that some factor, probably the election of Wilson, has caused the Forestry Department to recognize the West's viewpoint on conservation.

THE CONSERVATION QUESTION.

No appointment that President-elect Wilson can make will be more vital to the interests of the United States than the selection of a Secretary of the Interior. The people of the country who have watched the departure of so-called conservationists from the true conservation doctrine, which certainly is not confiscation, will await with interest the first announcement from Mr. Wilson as to the policy he will pursue with reference to the development of the Nation's natural resources.

There has grown up in recent years a bureaucratic sentiment in Washington which has been working gradually toward the complete destruction of the old Democratic theory of State's rights, and it will be interesting to see whether Mr. Wilson shall lend moral support to this movement. In New Jersey he has not hesitated to grapple with problems which should be handled by a governor and not by the President of the United States, and it will be strange indeed if he should change his program when he comes to Washington. As governor he has not tried to interfere with national functions. By the same token it is probable that he will impress upon his supporters when he comes to Washington that there should be no interference by the Federal Government in matters which are within the jurisdiction of the States.

The effect of the bureaucratic proclivities which have been manifest within recent years would be to seize all the State and private rights in the waterways of this country by confiscating the property of the riparian owners and usurping the rights of the States. All the power rightfully exercised by the Federal Government was conferred by the States. The States did not endow the Federal Government with control of streams, except as to navigation.

The theory of the "conservationists" is that the natural resources are being preserved for posterity. The practical result, however, is simply stagnation. The Government itself will not build dams and sell the power because of the expense, and if it will not permit private capital to do the work, progress will be at an end.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For market and other miscellaneous forest investigations, and for collating, digesting, recording, illustrating, and distributing the results of the experiments and investigations herein provided for, $40,160.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman why there is an increase in this item of nearly $9,000 over that of last year?

Mr. LAMB. The increase of $8,800 has been made to cover the expense of temporary draftsmen in preparing maps and atlas sheets, the result of grazing recognizance and additional map work incident to the acquisition of lands under act of March 1, 1911.

Mr. SHERLEY. That does not tell us very much. Last year they had $31,000. How much of this was expended for map work? What were the balances?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, under the old appropriation of $40,160, which the committee reduced in the current law, they spent for information, $3,620; for publication, $9,300; for forest atlas, $27,240; making a total of $40,160. That was the law when we took charge of it last year, and we reduced it last year by the difference between $40,000 and $31,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does it cost three times as much to make it available as it does to get the information that they obtained under this item?

Mr. LEVER. Well, a good deal of the cost here, of course, is making the forest atlas.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but your first item was that they spent $3,000 in getting the information and $9,000 in making it available.

Mr. LEVER. The making up of the forest atlas would come, necessarily, from the information obtained under this item and under all the items of the Forest Service.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that; but that is not what the gentleman stated. The gentleman segregated the item of $40,000 into three classes—$3,000 was for getting the information, $9,000 for making that information available, and the balance was for the atlas.

Mr. LAMB. Here is what Mr. Graves said:

This $40,000 appropriation is, in the first place, for working at the investigations in the office. It provides for the Forest Atlas and it pays for the preparation of maps, photographic work connected with it, and the drafting. This particular item in this appropriation is estimated at $27,240 of the entire $40,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Last year you cut it $9,000, practically. This year you give it back to them. Now, if you ought to have cut it last year, why should you increase it this year?

Mr. LAMB. Because of the increase of the work; that is what they tell us.

Mr. SHERLEY. How will they make out with their appropriation this year? Are they going to have any deficit?

Mr. LAMB. Well, I do not know whether they will or not.

Mr. LEVER. We think not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then why increase it?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman himself, I think, in his own bill made some increases, perhaps, over the current law; did he or did he not?

Mr. SHERLEY. Sometimes, and I sometimes try to give a reason for it. I do not know whether this is a right increase or not, and that is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. LAMB. They have increased the domain of the forest reserves, and on account of the administration of it they are urging that very strongly as a justification for a slight increase.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it is a complete one, there is no need of having anything to do except to pass their estimate.

Mr. LAMB. I will make this observation in passing: A good deal of this will be employed in connection with the eastern portion, where we are buying new forests all the time.

Mr. SHERLEY. My experience has been that the increases that they most strongly urge are increases connected with publication and office work.

Mr. LAMB. We are buying new farms and have to map them. The gentleman from Oregon is on the committee, and perhaps he can give some information.

Mr. HAWLEY. I remember in the testimony before the committee the Forester said there was a congested condition of the work; that he had not been able to keep up with the office work with the amount of the appropriation they had. There is a congestion in the office, and they ask an additional appropriation that they may work up that congested material.

Mr. SHERLEY. What I did not understand is how, if they are in such a congested state in the office, this very wise committee last year should have cut the appropriation $9,000, and you now propose to increase it.

Mr. LAMB. Because we have I do not know how many thousand acres of new land.

Mr. HAWLEY. Several hundred thousand.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$40,160" and to substitute "$31,360."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 36, line 4, by striking out "$40,160" and inserting "$31,360."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this paragraph to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] offers an amendment is a general paragraph for miscellaneous forest investigation, and on the preceding page we have passed a paragraph for special study and ascertainment of woods that are suitable for making paper. I examined some months ago with a little care several volumes on wood-pulp and print-paper investigation, which were published when the Payne bill was under consideration, and to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] gave so much attention. In examining those reports, it showed that the forests of New England and of the West had been looked to for furnishing sufficient wood for print paper. I am heartily in accord with the committee touching the first paragraph, and I think there should be no decrease in this item. I think a careful investigation of the forests of the Northeast and Northwest was very opportune, but I doubt if the department has gone far enough in the southern timber range in its investigation for woods adapted for manufacture of wood pulp for high-grade paper. The bay, the poplar, the pine, are by reason of climatic conditions more tense in their tissue, more compact and strong in their fiber in the higher latitudes. As you go to the forests of southern Louisiana, southern Alabama, southern Georgia, southern Mississippi, and northern Florida, you find the bay, the poplar, and the black pine, the latter as contradistinguished from the yellow, long-leaf pine, which is a resinous pine. They are of soft texture, porous, and coarse in fiber. The tops and butt ends are thrown away in sawmill manufacture, and if this department of the Government would investigate, they would, I apprehend, ascertain that millions of feet of wood are being destroyed that would occupy the same place now as the wood that we go to Canada to obtain. Vast forests of it now grow in that area. I know they have made some investigations, but they have never, with sufficient persistence, gone there, and, on the ground, in elaborate way, tested the various types and forms of these woods. This is directed not so much to this committee as to the appropriate department of the Government charged with expending wisely these appropriations.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman spoke of much timber that is being wasted in certain States which I have heretofore regarded as States in which the people thought they could manage their own affairs very well. Does the gentleman think the Government ought to go down there and tell them how to prepare the timber they are wasting?

Mr. RODDENBERY. No, sir. I was suggesting that the department might do in the southern forests what the reports on these various appropriations show they have done in New England and in the Northwest. I want to be distinctly understood as ratifying and thoroughly approving precisely what they have done in New England and precisely what they have done in the Northwest. And it was with no purpose to undertake to make the impression that any section had by design or intentional discrimination been neglected, but I think perhaps it is because the conditions have not been brought to the department's attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in order that the committee may get the right viewpoint, I would like to read from the hearings on page 52, as follows:

This $40,000 appropriation is, in the first place, for working at investigations in the office. It provides for our forest atlas. It pays for the preparation of maps, the photographic work connected with that, and the drafting. That is the principal item in this appropriation, estimated at $27,240 of the entire $40,000. All of Mr. Plummer's statistical work in the compilation and maintenance of our statistics and maps comes under this item. We are asking for an increase of that, because the examination of these eastern forests involves a great deal of additional map work. We are concentrating our map work as far as we can in the head offices rather than having it done in the field, because we have got the machinery for it, and this procedure is a great deal more economical, and the extra map work due with the new purchases of land is adding an additional burden, and we did not have money enough—we will not have money enough for next year's work under the present appropriation.

Now, then, that we may not get our appropriations mixed, the statement of Mr. Graves before the committee is to the effect that on account of the fact that we have brought under control under the Weeks law about 340,000 acres of additional land which must be mapped this increase is asked; and that is all there is to it. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. I am always interested in anything that my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] says, and hence I desire to help correct him as to his viewpoint on the subject of manufacture of paper.

The woods which grow in the South are not in the main adapted to the manufacture of ground wood pulp, which is the article used to produce news print paper or cheap book paper, such as schoolbook paper. But there is a large amount of wood in the South which is now used for the manufacture of what is called chemical pulp or soda pulp, used in the manufacture of book paper, and the hardwoods nowhere can be used for the manufacture of ground wood. It is a process of tearing the fiber apart on a grindstone. Very few woods except the spruce are easily adapted to it, although they are trying to find methods by using different speeds and different roughness and different processes to utilize other kinds of softwood for the same purpose.

This laboratory that the gentleman refers to at Wausau, Wis., was located there, by the way, because the department secured the cooperation of the manufacturers of ground wood, who paid most of the expense, and the benefits are extended to anybody who wants to avail of them. There is much wood that goes to waste, and on the other hand there is much wood now in the way of tops and branches used in the manufacture of soda pulp. But that is an expensive paper compared with that made from the ground wood, from which you make the news print paper.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that very little of this $40,000 is expended for investigation. Only about $3,000 of it is expended for that. A year ago this committee, the Committee on Agriculture, of its own initiative, evidently considered that the tendency that we find prevalent in all the departments—that of adding to the office force in Washington and having as much money spent here as possible, instead of in the field—had been in operation in connection with this item, and accordingly they reduced the item themselves. This year, however, without any reason to show that the money was not sufficient which they on their own judgment last year said would be sufficient, they come back and return the old sum. Their economy was of short life; it does not seem to have lasted very long.

Now, so much of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] as relates to this item may be answered by saying that only $3,000 of this has been used for experimental purposes. There is no reason why the previous amount which we have increased should not be used in the South as in the East or in the West. But why this item should be increased for the purpose of simply adding to the clerical force here in Washington in this connection I do not see.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, it seems evident that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has failed to understand the explanation that has been given, although the explanation of Mr. Graves has been read twice, first by myself and then by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], giving his reasons, which were that the purchase of lands under the Appalachian bill necessitated the making of these maps.

Mr. SHERLEY. Were not most of these additional lands purchased last year?

Mr. LAMB. No. The purchases have been made since then.

Mr. SHERLEY. What authority has the gentleman for that statement?

Mr. LAMB. I know from a man in my own town, a lawyer, who examines these titles, and the land was bought after the titles were perfected, and much of it purchased recently.

Mr. LEVER. Forty thousand acres were bought in the last few weeks.

Mr. SHERLEY. It has all been surveyed, so as to need to be mapped now?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; it has been surveyed so as to be mapped out of this fund.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I want to make a statement as to the purchases that have been made, so that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand the purchases, but not a word has been said that shows the necessity for more money for map purposes. Statements such as that which the gentleman has made are made before our committee repeatedly. There is not an item involving clerical force which the department officials do not support by saying that they are going to have additional work and therefore will require additional clerical force. It never seems to dawn on them that there is a necessity for actually doing more work.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Here is a summary of work that has been done under the Weeks law by the Forest Service:

   Total, $90,486.79.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much of that has been surveyed?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. More than a million acres have been surveyed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, why did you gentlemen cut the fund so much last year?

Mr. LAMB. I will say to the gentleman that last year we pared it down to the very bone; perhaps too much.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. More than a million acres have been surveyed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $400,000: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of the national forests from fire, may permit the use of timber free of charge for the construction of telephone lines: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the transportation or traveling expenses of any forest officer or agent except he be traveling on business directly connected with the Forest Service and in furtherance of the works, aims, and objects specified and authorized in and by this appropriation: And provided also, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article, but this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph. I desire to know why it is that $400,000 is annually appropriated here for building these roads, trails, and telephone lines? Does it take that amount of money to keep them up?

Mr. LAMB. We have been carrying that appropriation every year. It assists in the prevention of forest fires and conserves the property.

Mr. FOWLER. When will you get done building roads in these forests?

Mr. LAMB. About the time that Gabriel blows his trumpet.

Mr. FOWLER. You are going to ask for $400,000 annually until that time, are you?

Mr. LAMB. I rather think so—as long as the forests remain or until the roads are built. Then you must maintain them. Some people appear to forget this maintenance feature entirely.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the State of Oregon there is one forest that has over 3,000,000 acres in it. It comprises the backbone of the Cascade Mountains. It is a vast area, and has a great deal of ripe timber in it. Roads and trails have never been built in there since the Indians left the country, except in scattered portions of it.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that a new forest?

Mr. HAWLEY. It was created several years ago, I think.

Mr. FOWLER. And no roads have been built there yet?

Mr. HAWLEY. Only just in the outer edges of it.

Mr. FOWLER. How have they protected it from fire so far?

Mr. HAWLEY. They have not protected it from fire.

Mr. FOWLER. Has much timber been destroyed there?

Mr. HAWLEY. In the year 1911 there were several hundreds of millions of feet of timber destroyed in the State of Oregon by fire.

Mr. FOWLER. In this forest?

Mr. HAWLEY. Part of it in this forest. They are extending the roads and trails as fast as they can every year along the main lines of the mountains, so that they can rush in men and supplies whenever a fire breaks out, so as to subdue the fire at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you think it will take $400,000 annually to keep up these roads?

Mr. HAWLEY. It may for a time. I think in time they will have the roads and trails constructed.

Mr. LAMB. Oh, no; it will take an appropriation to maintain them.

Mr. HAWLEY. The forest reserves of the United States are of immense area. There are 16,000,000 acres in the State of Oregon alone.

Mr. FOWLER. Can you give us any idea as to how long you are going to require an annual appropriation of $400,000?

Mr. MANN. Long after you are dead.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know how long.

Mr. FOSTER. As long as you stay here at least.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not specially interested in this item. I am simply stating facts that I have observed.

Mr. FOWLER. How much of the $400,000 appropriated last year was spent for this purpose?

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose it has not all been exhausted yet, because the limit of time has not yet expired, but practically all will be expended.

Mr. FOWLER. How long have you been appropriating $400,000 annually?

Mr. HAWLEY. The appropriation was about that amount when I came on the committee, as I now recall.

Mr. FOWLER. Has it been increasing?

Mr. LAMB. I can say to the gentleman that according to the best calculation I can make these forests in about five or six years will become self-sustaining. When the railroads get into this timberland we will then receive as much from the forests as this bill amounts to, and then the gentleman will have no objection to the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I am trying to find out whether it is necessary to make this appropriation. If it is, I do not want to make a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. FOWLER. It is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BEALL of Texas). If the paragraph did not contain this language, beginning on line 9, page 36—

Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of the national forests from fire, may permit the use of timber free of charge for the construction of telephone lines—the Chair would overrule the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. It would not then be subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, that is new legislation, and the point of order being directed against the whole paragraph, it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I hope the gentleman will permit an explanation as to why this $400,000 is necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what I am after. My point of order is reserved against the paragraph for the purpose of getting information as to the necessity of appropriating $400,000 annually for the purposes contained in this paragraph.

Now, the part of the paragraph that is subject to a point of order the Chair has pointed out. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Government now uses Government timber for the purpose of constructing telephone lines, and that part of this paragraph does not give any additional advantage, because for the Government to pay for its own timber is like taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into the other.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. FOWLER. Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to press the point of order, because I am not familiar enough with the demand for this $400,000. Were I familiar enough with it to know that it was not necessary, as I do believe, I might insist on the point of order, but I do not feel that I ought to take the responsibility to cut out that part of the appropriation, and therefore I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order as to the word "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On line 9, page 36, insert, after the word "Provided," the words "That the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of the national forest from fire, may permit the use of timber free of charge for the construction of telephone lines."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 36, line 9, by inserting, after the word "Provided," the words "That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of the national forests from fire, may permit the use of timber free of charge for the construction of telephone lines."

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I can satisfy the gentleman who made the point of order with this explanation: All through the forests there are settlers who have built telephone lines from the outside. The shortest way frequently to get a line into settlers' homes is across the forest land. If they have to carry the poles from their own land to the forest land, it is going to cost a great deal of money and a great deal of labor. In every instance the settlers allow the Forestry Service not only to use their own lines and the telephones in their houses, but to connect with their private lines and extend them farther into the mountains. The Forestry Service really gets the service of these telephone lines without cost and the settlers maintain the lines. In exchange the settlers are to get this small amount of timber necessary to make the poles. I think it is a great benefit to the Forestry Service to have that provision.

Mr. MANN. Under this provision the Secretary might grant free poles to any telephone company in that part of the country.

Mr. HAWLEY. He might.

Mr. MANN. He would be asked to, would he not?

Mr. LAMB. He would not do it, save to conserve the best interest of the forest.

Mr. MANN. I think I would, if I was Secretary of Agriculture, because communication all through that country is desirable, as far as fighting fire is concerned. It is desirable to have communication 100 miles, perhaps. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limitation on the value of these poles?

Mr. LAMB. It is limited to the forest reserves.

Mr. MANN. It is not limited in its language to the use of telephone poles inside of the forest reserves.

Mr. LAMB. In some cases these forest reserves cover a third of the whole State. The provision gives the Secretary authority to dispose of the timber needed for these poles in the interest of the forests.

Mr. MANN. Then it would lap over into the adjoining State.

Mr. HAWLEY. The purpose of this is to furnish poles only when the system is carried across the forest land or lands intervening between forest lands; to allow them to cut down suitable trees as they go along to make poles to attach the wires to.

Mr. MANN. Then it is poorly expressed, because this is what it says:

May permit the use of timber free of charge for the construction of telephone lines—not in the forest reserve, but anywhere when he may deem it necessary for the protection of the national forests from fire. Now, it is very essential, in the opinion of many forest supervisors, to communicate with people all about the country in a time of fire. Do I understand it is the purpose to furnish poles for everybody who wants to build a line in that part of the country?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has not overlooked the qualification that whenever the Secretary may deem it necessary for the protection of forests from fire.

Mr. MANN. But this communication with adjoining towns is desirable.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then it is only when it is necessary.

Mr. LEVER. And necessary for a certain purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, is it the gentleman's opinion that the right to furnish these poles should be limited to cases where the lines are to be built on forest reserves?

Mr. LAMB. That is what I think.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the committee should add to their amendment the words "on forest reserves" at the end of the amendment. That would make it clear.

Mr. MANN. That would be all right, if that would be done.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman certainly would not want to put that limitation on. There are many places where forests are served, where at different places the line crosses public lands and public roads that are not in the reserve, and certainly this is a wise and just provision, where they construct those local telephone lines. They are used whenever the Government wants them for the purpose of assisting in fighting fire by calling in men. You certainly ought to give us the right to cut the poles and use them for building such lines.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think there will be multiplication of telephone lines. All the settlers will get will be a few poles of no special value as they stand in the forest, and they will have to furnish the wire and the insulators and all the instruments, and do all the work, and the Government gets the advantage of that.

Mr. RAKER. Is not every line that is put up an addition and an advantage to the Government?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. The Government gets the protection of the national forests by the use of these telephone lines, put from one forest to another by these private companies.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. Out in the forest in Oregon I have made some investigation. Settlers will carry the lines many miles into the mountains and then the Forest Service attaches to the nearest line and carries it back to their lookout stations or cabins.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Illinois very properly asked why we need $400,000 for the building of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other necessary improvements on the forest reserves. I should offer an amendment increasing this item $100,000 if I thought there was any possibility of securing the increase. Gentlemen will recall that the forest reserves of the United States are an area a little over five times the size of the great State of Illinois. I refer now to the forest reserves in continental United States, exclusive of Alaska. They are largely rough, broken, mountainous country. The protection of the timber from fire requires the cutting of fire lanes, and the great loss referred to a moment ago in Oregon, Idaho, and Washington two years ago was largely due to the fact that there were no fire lanes or that they were infrequent. In addition to that, telephone, trail, and road communications through the reserves is essential, not only to the utilization of the reserves themselves but for the benefit and comfort of the people who live in the locality, who must travel across the reserves. It is necessary to build cabins for the forest rangers, and it is necessary to fence their little pastures. It is necessary to do a thousand and one things to make these reserves available for use; and when you consider that you are covering a territory of 165,000,000 acres, which is over five times the area of Illinois, if I recollect the area of that imperial Commonwealth, and that it is a new country, mountainous, that it has many rivers, canyons, and heavy timber, the amount carried is altogether too small. It ought to be a million dollars.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not pretend that this $400,000 is all that is carried in the bill for that purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. Nearly all.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. There is another little item of 10 per cent.

Mr. MANN. A very large item.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not a very large item. That item is not as large as it ought to be, and the Forest Service could economically use annually a million dollars for the next five years and still not build all of the roads and trails and not cut all of the fire lanes that ought to be built and cut. If we had made this appropriation larger four or five years ago we might have saved a loss of millions of dollars in forest fires two years ago. It is true that this last year we have had a very favorable season. The rains have fallen and it has been possible to protect the forests, but when we have another like the season of two years ago we are likely to again discover what poor economy it was not to appropriate more than we do for these purposes. I do not complain of the committee—the committee has given all that the department asked. The department has been altogether too modest. The department does not realize the necessity of the situation from the standpoint of fire lanes and of means of communication.

Mr. LAMB. If the gentleman was on the committee he would not think the department was modest.

Mr. MONDELL. They were not so modest in some other matters. They did very well in the matter of investigating the boll weevil and cattle tick and some other things that trouble the brethren in the sunny South, but we are glad that they take a broad view of their duties and responsibilities in those things, and we only regret they do not take as broad a view of their duties and responsibilities touching these great areas of reserve, which do contain, as I said a moment ago, some very valuable timber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

That an additional 10 per cent of all moneys received from the national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part.

In all, for general expenses, $3,110,299.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 1, page 37, the word "ten" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five," so that it will read "an additional 25 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 37, line 1, by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty-five."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina, What is the existing law on the subject?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the Digest of Laws applicable to the Department of Agriculture, page 164, it is provided:

That hereafter, on or before the 1st day of January of each year, the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit to Congress classified and detailed reports of all receipts by the Forest Service and classified and detailed estimates of all expenditures intended for that service for the next fiscal year and detailed reports of all expenditures under any appropriation for such service during the preceding fiscal year: And provided further, That 10 per cent of all moneys received from each forest reserve during any fiscal year, including the year ending June 30, 1906, shall be paid out of the fund thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State or Territory in which said reserve is situated, to be expended as the State or Territorial legislature may prescribe for the benefit of the public schools and the public roads of the county or counties in which the forest reserve is situated.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. That does not relate to the additional 10 per cent?

Mr. MANN. That has been raised to 25 per cent, and then comes along another 10 per cent, and now the gentleman wants to raise that to 25 per cent. Why not make each one 50 per cent and get four or five items together? Next year I am going to strike out this item on the point of order before it gets to the amendatory stage.

Mr. LEVER. In fact, the item is subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. The item is subject to the point of order, and it will be made the next time.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, no point of order having been made to the paragraph, which would be out of order, it can be perfected or changed by any germane amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, on that matter I want to read what the Chief Forester said in regard to this in his testimony before the committee. This is on page 54 of the testimony:

Mr. GRAVES. May I add a word about this road item before leaving it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAVES. I favor very emphatically this item, and last year I expressed myself to individual members of the conference committee, when I was consulted about this, as even in favor of the 25 per cent. There are in the national forests so many remote ranches and communities where a small expenditure will be of enormous benefit in the development of the country. We have knowledge of a great many of these points, where settlers are able to raise perhaps a few hundred dollars, and by assistance from the Government of a few hundred or a few thousand dollars they may actually shorten the distance from their ranches and settlements to the nearest town or railroad by a good many miles. For instance, there is a case in one of the forests where 40 miles of haul for products of the farms will be saved; another, where it will be reduced from 50 to 27 miles; and a great many instances of that sort where the assistance to the settlers as a result of this first appropriation will be very great indeed.

Now, I have thought about the condition of the members on the committee, and I know they are giving the best attention they can to this item; but there is but one gentleman on the committee who has been in a position to actually go over these reserves and know what it means to the Government to put proper roads and trails over this property that it is now holding and controlling and for which it is collecting rent from the permittees and off of which it is selling large quantities of timber. The State is assisting half and half in places through its counties, and certainly the National Government as a private individual, or if it was part of the county so that it could assist in building the roads or trails, would expend money for the purpose of building those roads and trails for the accommodation of the people living in those communities, to say nothing about the question of the protection from fire; and undoubtedly it is the object and intent of Congress in such legislation to give the residents living adjacent to these forest reserves fair roads, decent trails, to go from one community to the other over the reserves that you have created, and particularly where you take 25 per cent of the money actually collected from the reserves to build these improvements.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAMB. I think we have discussed this about long enough.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is the point of order of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] still pending?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I make the point of order that we have passed the point where a point of order can be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. All points of order have been overruled. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I recall it, we now pay 25 per cent of the gross receipts from the forest reserves to the States for school and other purposes in lieu of taxation. In addition to that, we now pay 10 per cent of the gross receipts to the States for the building of roads and trails. In addition to that we appropriate $400,000, which we expend in the forests for the same purpose. That amounts to more than 50 per cent of the gross receipts from the national forests. Whenever the constituents of my distinguished friend from California [Mr. RAKER] are willing to pay 10 per cent of the gross receipts from their business for taxation, I will be glad to join him in providing that the Government shall pay more than 50 per cent of the gross receipts from our operation of the national forests.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. It strikes me that it takes more gall than anything else I know of for these people to insist that out of the gross receipts in the operation of the national forests we shall spend more than one-half in lieu of taxation in the States.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. What is the amount of the receipts from the forest reserves?

Mr. LEVER. A little over $2,000,000. Now it is proposed to take 25 per cent of that $2,000,000 and add it to the $400,000 appropriated to go into the road fund.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I introduced a bill proposing an increase in this item to 20 per cent, and I did it after a very thorough investigation into the conditions of the forest reserves in my State. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] thinks we have a great deal of "nerve" out that way when we ask for simple justice. The only difficulty is that he does not fully understand the situation.

Mr. MANN. I never think that, because that is what you never ask for.

Mr. MONDELL. This particular item is intended to give the States and communities an opportunity to build and maintain roads on main lines of communication. One reserve in my State that I visited last fall has a road some 40 miles in length, extending across the reserve, that was built before the reserve was established. It was a fairly good mountain road. Since the reserve has been established there has been a decline in activities on the reserve, and under our laws it is doubtful if we can use the revenues obtained from taxation for the construction of roads on reserves. The result is that this road, which was built years ago, is falling into disuse, and a mountain road which I traveled without difficulty some years ago I found almost impossible to get over last year. This is coming to be a common experience.

Now, there are many main lines of communication—main roads—which the department does not feel justified in maintaining, much less in constructing, with the item of $400,000 carried elsewhere in the bill. Those main roads must be built and maintained. We are not asking anything that is not eminently fair and reasonable when we ask that a part of these taxes which our people pay to the Forest Service shall be used for the maintenance of main roads across the reserves. I hope the item may be increased to 25 per cent. It ought to be. We are entitled to that much of these revenues for these purposes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate be closed on the paragraph and amendments thereto in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. I see no reason for getting excited over a little amendment of this kind, offered here in the Committee of the Whole during the consideration of questions which we are in duty bound to decide for the people of this country. The only question involved here is one of common sense. There is no use in gentlemen from one section of the country accusing gentlemen from another section of the country of having too much gall or wanting something that is unfair.

This amendment of the gentleman from California merely authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to utilize an additional 25 per cent of the receipts from the national forests, to be used for what purpose? For the improvement of those very national forests. Where is the Member that will say that it is justice for the Federal Government to set aside as a national forest one-fourth and a little more of the area of a great State in this Union, as has been done in the State of Oregon, and then sit back supinely and refuse to build public highways across that great area?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the Government of the United States is now paying out a great deal more money for the conservation of these forests than it is receiving from them?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I understand that up to the present time the expenses of the national forests have exceeded the revenues therefrom. But here we do not propose any additional appropriation by this amendment. We propose only to set apart 25 per cent of the proceeds from the sale of timber and grazing privileges within the national forests.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then, as a matter of fact, you are asking the United States to build roads out there for you, are you not?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes; and there it no reason why all of the proceeds from the sale of timber and grazing privileges within the national forests should not be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the improvement of these forests in the way of roads, trails, telephone lines, and those other things which will go to prevent fire and permit the public to travel across those large withdrawals. In fact it could not amount to anything that would injure the Federal Government, because, as has been suggested, the Federal Government is, as a matter of fact, already expending more than the total receipts of the national forests upon the conservation work of the country at this time.

Why should not the proceeds be spent for this purpose? Why should we not specifically say by this amendment of the gentleman from California that one-quarter of the proceeds shall be expended within the national forests for the building of good roads?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a separate paragraph at the end of line 11, page 37.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at end of line 11, page 37, as a new paragraph, the following: "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with any State or States which shall have provided by law for the destruction of predatory wild animals and in which national forests are located, upon request of the proper State officials and upon such conditions as the Secretary may deem advisable, in the organization and maintenance of a plan for the destruction of such animals upon the national forests and the lands adjacent thereto, and out of the appropriation herein provided there shall be paid, upon proper certification by the Secretary of Agriculture, to the proper officer of each State in which forest reserves are located, a sum equal to that proportion of the amount expended by the State for the destruction of predatory wild animals for the preceding fiscal year that the area of permanently reserved forest lands in the State bears to the entire area of the State, $200,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. It is too long. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will withhold his point of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia withhold his point of order?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes an appropriation of $200,000 to aid in the destruction of predatory wild animals, and provides that of that sum the Secretary of Agriculture shall pay to the proper officer of each State having forest reserves a sum equal to that proportion of the bounty appropriation of the State that the area of the forest land bears to the entire area of the State.

In other words, the appropriation is in recognition of the fact that the General Government should bear its proportion of the cost to the State of the destruction of predatory wild animals. Forest reserves are, unfortunately, a breeding ground for wolves, coyotes, bears, and other predatory wild animals. Although the forest reserve may constitute one-third of an entire State—in the case of my State about one-eighth—the Federal Government bears no part of the cost of destroying these animals. It seems to me eminently fair and just that the Federal Government should pay its share of the cost of the destruction of these animals.

Most of the Western States make appropriations each year for the payment of bounties for the destruction of these animals, and it is simply proposed to have the Federal Government pay its share of this bounty expense. Nothing could be fairer. We are only asking the Federal Government to pay on the acreage it retains from the jurisdiction of the State, and largely from settlement.

I trust that the chairman of the committee will not insist on the point of order. Out in the western country we are being overrun by these animals. The loss annually in the destruction of sheep, cattle, horses, and particularly calves and colts, runs into the millions, and States go to great expense each year in providing for the destruction of these animals. In addition to that, stock associations in many cases pay very heavy bounties, and it is only fair that the Federal Government should do its share toward keeping down the number of these animals. Furthermore, I implore all lovers of game animals to join me in support of the appropriation so that predatory animals shall not multiply in the forest reserves to such a degree as to destroy the deer, antelope, elk, and other game.

Mr. BARTLETT. How about birds?

Mr. HELM. Do these animals which you have described destroy any Federal property?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I move to strike out the last word. I hope the committee will see fit to allow the gentleman from Wyoming to have this little appropriation added to the bill. From his statement it is evident that there is nothing for the Government to appropriate for in Wyoming except predatory wild animals, national forests, sheep, Army posts and reservations, public buildings, and the salaries of able statesmen. Certainly, the gentleman ought to be allowed this small item. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to reimburse owners of horses, vehicles, and other equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used for necessary fire fighting, trail, or official business, such reimbursement to be made from any available funds in the appropriation to which the hire of such equipment is properly chargeable.

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Is there no way of having the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. MANN. If we are going to pass the appropriation bills we have got to make progress with them.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the employees of the Forest Service engaged in office work in cities or towns outside of the District of Columbia, or in forest supervisors' offices, or who are assigned to permanent duty in Alaska, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leave of absence not to exceed 30 days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed 30 days additional in any one year.

Mr. COX. I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. The point of order is conceded.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Forest Service, $5,346,259.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. Will the chairman of the committee tell me what the gross receipts of the Forest Service are?

Mr. LAMB. Two million one hundred and fifty-seven thousand three hundred and fifty-six dollars.

Mr. BOOHER. What are the gross expenses?

Mr. LAMB. They are $5,346,259.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the chairman tell me whether or not the deficit is greater this year than last year?

Mr. LAMB. It is nearly the same. There are some contracts not realized on.

Mr. BOOHER. Then we are not getting anywhere near an even break in this matter.

Mr. LAMB. We will later, because the timber sales in the future will wipe it out.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes; I heard a former chief forester say that we would be even 10 years ago, and we are getting further away every year.

Mr. LAMB. Well, it takes a long time to develop a big business. The forester has in charge a territory larger than New England, New York, and Pennsylvania.

Mr. MANN. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that, in relation to the expenses, the gentleman from Virginia is not quite accurate, because we have taken 25 per cent of the gross receipts for schools and 10 per cent more for the construction of roads and trails in addition to the expense carried by the bill.

Mr. BOOHER. So the deficit is a million dollars more than appears in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Chemistry: One chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 supervising clerk, $2,500; 1 executive clerk, $2,000; 7 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,440; 12 clerks, class 2; 1 clerk, $1,300; 18 clerks, class 1; 13 clerks, at $1,020 each; 11 clerks, at $1,000 each; 22 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 chief food and drug inspector, $3,000; 1 food and drug inspector, $2,250; 10 food and drug inspectors, at $2,000 each; 14 food and drug inspectors, at $1,800 each; 1 food and drug inspector, $1,620; 13 food and drug inspectors, at $1,600 each; 4 food and drug inspectors, at $1,400 each; 4 laboratory helpers, at $1,200 each; 1 laboratory helper, $1,020; 4 laboratory helpers, at $1,000 each; 4 laboratory helpers, at $960 each; 2 laboratory helpers, at $900 each; 6 laboratory helpers, at $840 each; two laboratory helpers, at $780 each; 20 laboratory helpers, messengers, or laborers, at $720 each; 2 laboratory helpers, messengers, or laborers, at $660 each; 26 laboratory helpers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $600 each; 1 laboratory assistant, $1,200; 1 tool maker, $1,200; 1 sampler, $1,200; 1 janitor, $1,020; 1 student assistant, $300; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,050; 1 skilled laborer, $840; 2 messenger boys or laborers, at $540 each; 8 messenger boys or laborers, at $480 each; 3 messenger boys or laborers, at $420 each; 1 messenger boy or laborer, $360; 6 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $272,860.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The language, "one chemist who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000," changes existing law. The statute provides for a chemist at $2,000.

When the various agencies of this department were organized into bureaus, it was especially provided that all the laws in existence at that time should be applicable to the various bureaus. The Bureau of Chemistry, of Plant Industry, of Animal Industry, the Bureau of Soils, and, as I recollect, one other in 1902. It was especially provided in that act, as I will read for the benefit of those interested—

That all existing statutes relating to the Division of Soils be reorganized into the Bureau of Soils, the Division of Forestry reorganized into the Bureau of Forestry, the Division of Chemistry organized into the Bureau of Chemistry—and others that I will not take the time to read—shall remain in effect as applying to the respective bureaus into which the divisions named have been organized.

The statute of 1862 provided that the salary of the chemist shall be $2,000. I am reading now from the annotated Federal statutes in 10 volumes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the act creating the Department of Agriculture, sections 520, 521, and 522, it is provided that there shall be in the Department of Agriculture one chief clerk at a salary of $2,000, one chemist at a salary of $2,000 a year. In addition to that, section 523 provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint such other employees as Congress may from time to time provide.

I take the position that the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is not well taken, because the statute does not fix the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry. The statute does fix the salary of one chemist at $2,000 per annum, but the fact is that we are employing many chemists in the Department of Agriculture at salaries much above the salary fixed in the fundamental law for the one chemist to which the gentleman has referred. There is no place in the statute anywhere fixing the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, and that salary has been fixed from time to time under section 523 by provisions on the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Carolina if the one chemist provided for in the original act has come down through the various changes to be recognized a Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry?

Mr. LEVER. I will say frankly I do not know; but I call the attention of the Chair to a well-recognized rule of law, and that is that you can not look to persons in the interpretation of the law, but we must look to the position rather than the person who fills the position.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the authority of that statute creating the Department of Agriculture do I understand that the word "employees" would be broad enough to cover the chief of division, like the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry?

Mr. LEVER. In reply to the suggestion of the Chair permit me to call the attention of the Chair to the debate on the floor of the House some years ago with reference to the creation of the Remsen Board and for the employment of different chemists from the appropriation carried in this bill. I want to call attention to the fact that the Chair held that under the language there—"persons and other employees"—that it was decided that the Secretary of Agriculture had the right to employ such persons as would enable him to carry out the fundamental purpose of the creation of his department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to what occurred during the consideration of the last agricultural appropriation bill, when a point of order was made by the gentleman from Florida with respect to the solicitor for the department. That same article of the statute which the gentleman from South Carolina has just read was relied upon partly as furnishing authority for the existence of an official of that kind. It is the recollection of the Chair that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who presided over the committee at that time, held that that language with respect to an employee would not cover such an official as the head of a bureau or such an official as the Solicitor in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. But the fact is that the gentleman from Missouri, presiding at that time over the committee, overruled the point of order made by the gentleman from Florida and sustained the position of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but that was because the word "hereafter," which occurred in the agricultural appropriation bill of 1910, extended that law beyond that year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is not to be found anywhere in the statutes any language which fixes the salary of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, and that the only language fixing it must be found in an appropriation bill, the current law, and that the point of order is not well taken.

If the Chair will permit, let me call his attention to the fact that there is no law anywhere except the fundamental law of the Department of Agriculture, in this section 523, and the last appropriation bill, the current law, which fixes either the position of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry or the salary attached to it; but we feel we have a right to fix his salary and position under the fundamental law.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have before me the Annotated Statutes of the United States, and I have gone through with the various acts pertaining to the Agriculture Department, and nowhere has there been a change from the existing law passed since 1862 creating the position of chemist.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask a question right there? Did the gentleman find the statute which changed the title of that official from chemist to chemist who shall be chief of bureau?

Mr. FOWLER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he discover where that language first came into the bill?

Mr. FOWLER. I do not know when it was attempted to make this chemist the chief, but, Mr. Chairman, the fact that there is in the permanent law a provision for a chemist fixing the salary permanently can not be destroyed by a committee undertaking to place upon that name any additional words for the purpose of qualifying it. The very statute at the time when this bureau was created declared that all existing law should then be applicable to the Bureau of Chemistry, and for that reason, when a point of order was made against the appropriation bills for the various departments of the Government during this session, where it was sought to say that a chief clerk who should do some other things should get an increase of salary, the Chairman held that the chief clerk's salary was fixed by law, and his identity could not be destroyed by virtue of any additional words qualifying it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules I desire to call his attention to the following language:

> An exception to these general principles referring to the fact of legislation on appropriation bills is found in the established practice that in the absence of a general law fixing a salary the amount appropriated in the last appropriation has been held to be the legal salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from South Carolina there is no dispute about that proposition. It occurs to the Chair that inasmuch as the act creating the Department of Agriculture provided for one chemist and fixed the salary at the sum of $2,000, and that in this bill the first item under the Bureau of Chemistry is for one chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000, it would be the judgment of the Chair that that is the chemist whose salary was fixed in the bill creating the Department of Agriculture, and he is therefore constrained to sustain the point of order.

Was the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois directed simply to that office?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to press the point of order any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order to that salary alone?

Mr. FOWLER. What I read, "one chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. The item is stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. The item of "one chemist, who shall be chief of bureau, $5,000," is stricken out.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, "one chemist, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend page 38, by inserting after the word "chemistry," the words "one chemist, $2,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It will be a distinct reflection upon this House, upon this Congress, and upon the Department of Agriculture and the chief chemist, Department of Agriculture, to insert on the floor of the House an amendment designed to cover his office at $2,000. My colleague has availed himself of the privilege, which he has the right to do, to strike out the item in the bill on a point of order, but it ought to be left out instead of being restored at $2,000, because that would be an insult to this chief chemist, whoever he may be. I have not an acquaintance with him. The place which Dr. Wiley held for years ought not to be discredited by the House by the adoption of such an amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a moment upon the amendment. I have offered my amendment, Mr. Chairman, in good faith. The statute of the United States provides for a chemist of the Agricultural Department and fixes the salary at $2,000. If there is need of other officers in this department, Congress has ample power and ought to be willing to create whatever other positions are necessary to carry into effect the objects of this department. If a chief chemist is necessary to preside over the Bureau of Chemistry, then I say that Congress is derelict in its duty if it does not create such a position and fix a definite and adequate salary therefor, and for my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to say that it is a reflection upon Dr. Wiley to amend the paragraph to make it conform to the statute is to say that Congress, of which he has been a Member for the last 16 years, has neglected its duty in not providing for the position of a chief of chemistry. It is an acknowledgment of the deplorable condition of this department. Instead of trying to reflect upon me in my efforts to comply with the statute my colleague [Mr. MANN] ought to go back home and get down on his knees by the side of his bed to-night before he goes to sleep and pray to the God of heaven to forgive him for his sins of omissions of duty which he has committed as a Member of Congress for lo these many years.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 28283, the Agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry; that means when the House adjourns to-night?

The SPEAKER. Why, of course, that does not interfere with the order adopted. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I have to present a conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The statement has not been signed by my colleague on the conference committee. I ask unanimous consent that at the evening session, after I get that statement signed, I be permitted to present it under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that at the evening session that is set apart for the consideration of private bills that he may have leave to present the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for printing in the RECORD. The reason that he does not do so now is because some member of the conference committee has not signed it. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Italian labor on the farm.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Italian labor on the farm.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as a part of the same request I ask unanimous consent that I have the right to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the interstate shipment of liquor bill which passed Saturday.

Mr. BARTLETT. That has been already granted.

Mr. RAKER. No; I did not get a chance to speak.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman couples that with the other I shall object to both.

Mr. RAKER. I certainly couple it.

Mr. MANN. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to both requests.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to the request of the gentleman from California if he will make it by itself.

Mr. RAKER. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Italian labor on the farm. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill relative to the interstate shipment of liquor passed on last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill relative to the interstate shipment of liquor. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House was in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, at 8 o'clock the House was called to order by the Speaker.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on next Monday, February 10, 1913, the House shall stand in recess from the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. until the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., at which time it shall be in order to consider in the House, as in Committee of the Whole, bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the naval pension fund, to the estate of Antonia Sousa, deceased, late a musician in the Marine Corps of the United States, the sum of $19.50 per month from March 4, 1886, to April 27, 1892, both inclusive, being the amount of allotment granted to the said Antonia Sousa by the Secretary of the Navy under section 4756, Revised Statutes of the United States, which was wrongfully withheld from him by the former Commissioner of Pensions, and the necessary amount is hereby appropriated out of the naval pension fund.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out in lines 6, 7, 8, 9, page 1, and line 1, page 2, the following words: "The sum of $19.50 per month from March 4, 1886, to April 27, 1892, both inclusive, being the amount of allotment granted to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the sum of $1,431.25, the total amount found to be due the estate of the pensioner."

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I will withhold it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to state that I believe this to be a particularly meritorious bill, and if the gentleman would look into it I think he would not make an objection. It is to correct the military record of an officer of the Army who was appointed major from the grade of captain, but two days before the Senate confirmed it he died. His rank had been reached; he was entitled to the rank, and his name was sent to the Senate, but he died two days before the Senate confirmed it. This bill is simply to give his widow the right to the extra six months' pay for his rank as major over what it would have been for his rank as captain.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 21526) for the relief of H. J. Randolph Hemming.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a minute?

Mr. MANN. I will reserve it for a minute, but the bill is so thoroughly bad——

Mr. SLAYDEN. As long as the gentleman denounces a bill to which my name is attached as bad——

Mr. MANN. I did not notice that the gentleman's name was attached to it.

Mr. SLAYDEN (continuing). I feel as if I would like a few moments to make a statement. I never heard of Mr. Hemming until a year or two ago when a Senator from a Western State called the bill to my attention and convinced me that Mr. Hemming had been employed by a representative of this country in India, and that he helped to protect the United States against the infringement of certain of its laws.

I introduced a bill at the request of the Senator, and it was taken to the Committee on Claims, gone over very thoroughly, and while the amount claimed by Mr. Hemming was not allowed they investigated it and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. DICKINSON, particularly found that Mr. Hemming had been employed by an official representative of this Government, and that he had rendered considerable and valuable services, and had incurred some outlay of money. I do not know anything about the facts except as they are set forth in the document. Judge DICKINSON, who gave more attention to it than any other man in the committee, became convinced of the justice of his claim and that we ought to give the man what was properly due him. That is all my interest in the matter, and with that I am willing to leave it to the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is the case of an attorney in India—in Bombay or Calcutta, I do not know which—who claimed that he had been employed by a consular officer with authority. That was denied. The consular officer did at one time say that the services rendered were probably worth $500. This gentleman is now or has been recently in this country prosecuting the claim and has announced that he proposes to have it adjudicated as a claim by a citizen of Great Britain against the United States under the commissioners that were appointed for the purpose of settling such claims. The bill was introduced for $10,000. If the gentleman has a claim for $10,000 which is legitimate, he ought to have $10,000. The consular officer reported that there might properly be paid to him $500. The committee reports $2,000. I think he had better follow his rights, if he has any, to the $10,000 in the regular manner. I object.

ELLEN M. STONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2461) to provide for the repayment of the ransom of Ellen M. Stone.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. POU. Division, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be heard for one minute.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 18, and the noes are 42, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order for a moment.

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, yes; I will.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be heard for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he be heard for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the House that there are quite a number of meritorious bills on this calendar. The members of the Committee on Claims have worked like a lot of court referees for nearly two years, and to-night will probably be the last chance, I am afraid, for any of these bills to be passed by the House. So I hope the House will not adjourn now and leave these bills on the calendar. Furthermore, I do hope that gentlemen will not object unless they have investigated the records in the respective cases and feel that they are exercising a legislative duty by entering such objections.

Now, there is not a single one of these bills in which I have any interest, except that interest which every Member feels in desiring to see meritorious bills passed. I believe that can be said of every member of the Committee on Claims. We have worked very hard to accommodate the Members of this House interested in the bills on this calendar, and you have an opportunity to pass them now. I hope the House will not adjourn, and I hope gentlemen will not object unless they feel impelled to do so from a sense of legislative duty. [Applause.]

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, if these bills are going to be disposed of as we have been disposing of them there is not any use of the House staying in session. However, to see whether any of these bills will be considered, I will withdraw my point of no quorum at present.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that we adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 46.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of a call of the House will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Thirty-nine gentlemen have risen in the affirmative; a sufficient number.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eleven gentlemen have risen in the negative. Thirty-nine is more than one-fifth of fifty; so the yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the call of the House. Those in favor of the call of the House will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 42, answered "present" 11, not voting 244, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 5 with the original thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon on the 4th day of February, 1913, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 4th day of February, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] BEN W. OLCOTT,
Secretary of State.

House joint memorial 5.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Willamette River, a navigable stream, has a tendency in past years of deviating from its proper course, at Independence, and attempting to cut through the fertile lands situated immediately below the city of Independence, consisting of the largest and best hop lands in the world, thus rendering the present channel unfit for navigation; and

Whereas in former years the Government, recognizing the necessity of preserving the present channel of the Willamette River, at Independence, in its integrity, caused a revetment to be built at a cost of $50,000; and

Whereas this revetment is a decided success so far as it is possible for a revetment of its size, but it is only half large enough and does not afford sufficient protection to prevent the river encroaching on the banks, and this destruction goes on from one high water to another; and

Whereas this encroachment of the river upon the banks has a tendency to cut an entirely new channel or to cause a division of the present channel which will make futile the work already done aside from being a direct menace to the navigation of said upper Willamette River above Salem; and

Whereas an appropriation is necessary for the immediate improvement and future preservation of the navigation of the Willamette River at the revetment at Independence; Therefore be it

Resolved, That your memorialists favor an appropriation sufficient to improve and preserve this revetment to the end that navigation of the upper Willamette River above Salem be preserved and that the lands adjoining be protected.

Adopted by the house January 28, 1913.

C. N. MCARTHUR,
Speaker of the House.

Concurred in by the senate January 30, 1913.

DAN J. MALARKEY,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Ben W. Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 4th day of February, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] BEN W. OLCOTT,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial 7.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas a bill has been introduced into the United States Senate for passage, being Senate bill 8003, providing for the construction, maintenance, and improvement of post roads and rural-delivery routes through the cooperation and joint action of the National Government and the several States in which such post roads or rural-delivery routes may be established; and

Whereas the passage of said bill by Congress would greatly inure to the benefit and advantage of the State of Oregon and its subdivisions: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That your memorialists favor the enactment of Senate bill 8003 by Congress of the United States, which will greatly inure to the benefit and advantage of the State of Oregon in the construction of its roads and public highways; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be directed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Oregon in Congress

Adopted by the house January 31, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 8 with the original thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon on the 4th day of February, 1913, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 4th day of February, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] BEN W. OLCOTT,
Secretary of State.

Senate joint memorial 8.

To the honorable Sixty-second Congress of the United States assembled:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Sixty-first Congress recognized the duty of the Federal Government to protect from fire the forested watersheds of navigable streams in the passage of the Weeks law; and

Whereas under the provisions of section 2 of the said law the Secretary of Agriculture during 1911 and 1912 allotted to Oregon the sum of $15,000, which was expended with splendid results under the direction of the State forester in protecting from fire the watersheds of practically every navigable stream in the State, and it appears that because of lack of funds the Secretary is unable to continue the cooperation on the same scale as it has been conducted during the past two years; and

Whereas, representing a Commonwealth to which the protection of its great forest resources, forest industries, and navigable streams from the injurious effects of forest fires is of vital importance, and which supports such protection through liberal appropriations by its own legislature and great expenditure of private money and effort: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Oregon, in the twenty-seventh legislative session assembled, respectfully and earnestly petition and urge the Congress of the United States at its present session the continuation of Federal cooperation to the same end as provided in section 2 of the Weeks law, and that provision therefor be made one of the annual appropriations by Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be authorized and directed to forward a copy of this memorial to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairmen of the House and Senate Committees on Agricultural Appropriations, the Secretary of Agriculture, and to each of the Members of the Oregon delegation of said National Congress.

Adopted by the house January 31, 1913.

C. N. MCARTHUR,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 29, 1913.

DAN J. MALARKEY,
President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 6 with the original thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon on the 4th day of February, 1913, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 4th day of February, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.] BEN W. OLCOTT,
Secretary of State.

House joint memorial 6.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas we are convinced that the requirements of the repayment of the cost of construction of Government irrigation projects in 10 years is too great a burden upon the landowner under said projects, and its enforcement will eventually mean the ruin of the majority of those whom the reclamation act was designed to assist and benefit; and

Whereas we are convinced that the applicants for water under said project should be given a period of 25 years in which to return to the Government the money expended for the construction and maintenance of said projects, and that the money which would otherwise be used in making payments to the United States for said water-right charges could be more beneficially used in development work within the said projects; and

Whereas we are convinced that the requirement of residence on irrigation projects constructed by the Reclamation Service of the United States is an unjust and unreasonable requirement; that it prevents the landowners in these projects from engaging in their accustomed occupations during the time when the land is being developed and produces nothing in return: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives and Senators in Congress be, and the same are hereby, memorialized and requested to amend section 5 of the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, so as to read as follows:

"No sale of water right shall be made for any land in private ownership in excess of 160 acres to any one landowner, and no sale shall be deemed complete until all payments therefor are made, but the time for said payments for said water right may be extended for a period of time not to exceed 25 years from date of water-right application, at the discretion of the Secretary of Interior."

Adopted by the house January 28, 1913.

C. N. MCARTHUR,
Speaker of the House.

Concurred in by the senate January 30, 1913.

DAN J. MALARKEY,
President of the Senate.

He also presented a petition of the Worley Bible Class, of Bethany Baptist Sunday School, of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMAS. I present a senate joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of Colorado, relating to the bill (S. 8403) to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 4.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, would respectfully represent that under and by direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. R. B. Marshall, chief geographer of the department, recently visited Colorado to determine by perconal observation whether there should be established in Colorado a national park.

That the said Marshall, following the said order, visited Colorado, and after a careful and painstaking examination of the country proposed to be included in said national park, recommended the creation of the same.

That the people of Colorado desire that said park shall be established. It includes the highest mountain peaks in the State; the area is little adapted to either agriculture or grazing; its scenery for sublimity and grandeur is not excelled on the continent; its location is easy of access to America's millions who seek health and recreation in the summer months, it being situated in the front and main range of the Rocky Mountains.

We therefore urge that you pass an act creating the said Rocky Mountain National Park, adopting the metes and bounds as set forth in the report of said Chief Geographer Marshall to the Secretary of the Interior, and embodying provisions as contained in a bill for an act creating the said park, prepared and introduced in the National House of Representatives for that purpose.

And this your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. GRONNA presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Missouri Slope District North Dakota Bankers' Association, praying for the passage of the so-called agricultural extension bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Globe, Ariz., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of members of the faculty of Westminster Theological Seminary of Maryland, praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon "red-light" injunction bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT presented memorials of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., praying that an appropriation be made for the opening and extension of Sixteenth Street NW., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT (for Mr. BRYAN), from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2708) for the relief of the owners of lighter No. 128, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also (for Mr. BRYAN), from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 6028) for the relief of the heirs of the late Samuel H. Donaldson, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27323) to provide for refund or abatement under certain conditions of penalty taxes imposed by section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, known as the special excise corporation-tax law, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1204) thereon.

TERMS OF DISTRICT COURT IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 28094) to amend section 96, chapter 5, of the act of Congress of March 3, 1911, entitled "The Judicial Code." I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read, Mr. President.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the bill merely relates to the holding of terms of court in Trenton and Newark, N. J.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 96, chapter 5, of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1911, and therein designated "The Judicial Code," so as to read as follows:

SEC. 96. The State of New Jersey shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of New Jersey. Terms of the district court shall be held at Newark on the first Tuesday in April and the first Tuesday in November and at Trenton on the third Tuesday in January and the second Tuesday in September of each year. The clerk of the court for the district of New Jersey shall maintain an office, in charge of himself or a deputy, at Newark and at Trenton, each of which offices shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court; and the marshal shall also maintain an office, in charge of himself or a deputy, at Newark and at Trenton, each of which offices shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATORS FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I send up a report of that committee on papers referred to it in relation to the nomination and election of CLARENCE W. WATSON and WILLIAM E. CHILTON as Senators of the United States. I ask to have the report read. It is accompanied by a resolution, for which I will ask immediate consideration after the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont submits a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report (No. 1206):

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the petition of William E. Glasscock, William Seymour Edwards, Herschel C. Ogden, David B. Smith, and F. A. MacDonald, citizens of West Virginia, making certain charges and allegations of fraud and corruption connected with the nomination and election of CLARENCE W. WATSON and WILLIAM E. CHILTON as Senators of the United States from the State of West Virginia, report

That a careful examination of the said petition and of all the papers submitted by the Senate to the committee discloses—

First. That the Legislature of West Virginia, which convened on the 11th day of January, A. D. 1911, chose Messrs. CLARENCE W. WATSON and WILLIAM E. CHILTON as Senators of the United States from the State of West Virginia, and that they appeared, took their oath of office, and are now sitting as Senators in this body. The petitioners do not state or allege that in such election any individual member of the legislature was bribed to vote for either of the persons named, or that, in voting for them, or either of them, any member thereof was actuated by any corrupt or improper motive.

Second. It does not appear upon any of the papers before this committee that in such election any member of the Legislature of West Virginia was improperly approached by any person interested in the election of either of the said Senators, or that any improper offer or inducement of any kind or nature was made to any such member to cast his vote for said Senators, or either of them.

Third. The only direct charge that money was improperly used, or attempted to be used, by anyone is contained in a purported statement of L. J. Shock, a member of the West Virginia Legislature, that, on the 18th day of January, 1911, prior to the caucus of the Democratic members of the legislature, which was held to nominate party candidates for United States Senators, he was paid $1,000, and promised a further sum, to vote for Messrs. WATSON and CHILTON for United States Senators. This statement was read by Hon. George W. Bland, a State senator, before the Joint Assembly of the Legislature of West Virginia on the 25th day of January, 1911. But it affirmatively appears, from the papers submitted to this committee, that the charge made by Mr. Shock was without foundation, and has been fully retracted in a statement made by him to Senator WATSON, of which the following is a copy:

BURNSVILLE, W. VA., January 8, 1913.

Hon. C. W. WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The time has come when you should know the truth about the so-called Shock statement. I never have signed any statement that was read before the legislature and I never have been under oath. I have let the talking go on because I hated to be put in a wrong light. The truth is that I set up the whole business. Nobody tried to buy my vote, and would not swear that they did. I wanted to nominate McGraw, and I thought if I got this thousand dollars and made this play, it would hurt you and CHILTON. The trick failed to work, and now you have the truth. I do not know you, and am sending this to you because I want justice to be done. So far as I know, your election and CHILTON'S was honest and fair, and it is wrong to have this report going around.

Very truly, yours, L. J. SHOCK.

Fourth. All other matters contained in the petition aforesaid are rumors without apparent foundation—statements of individual opinion, newspaper stories, and speculations as to general conditions existing in and about the legislature and throughout the State of West Virginia just previous to and at the time of such election. These do not in any instance refer to the action of any particular member of the Legislature of West Virginia. They do not charge any act of bribery or attempted bribery. They neither name any member of that body as having received, nor as having been asked to receive, money for his vote, nor do they indicate any person who made any attempt to bribe or improperly influence any member of the legislature. They are of that general character too frequently indulged in both by individuals and by the public press on the occasion of elections in connection with which great public interest is aroused, and, while calculated to arouse suspicion and create prejudice, they do not, in the opinion of the committee, present a proper basis for action on the part of the Senate.

The commmttee are unanimously of the opinion that the prayer of the petition should not be granted, and submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from further consideration of the subject.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my attention was diverted. I wish to be certain what this is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

Mr. STONE. No; I desire to be certain just what it relates to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It relates to the question of the validity of the election of the Senators from West Virginia, Senator WATSON and Senator CHILTON. The resolution has been read to the Senate. It is now before the Senate for action. [Putting the question.] The resolution is unanimously agreed to. The report, the Chair understands, is a part of the action of the Senate. The report is adopted and the resolution is agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—DAVID LOWRY.

COMMISSION ON RURAL CREDITS (S. DOC. NO. 1071).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senate is familiar with the fact that the Southern Commercial Congress is organizing a commission consisting of men from each State who are to leave for Europe during the month of April to spend three months abroad studying in foreign countries the systems of cooperation which have contributed toward improving rural credits and agricultural finance.

The work of this commission was formally indorsed both in the Senate and in the House by a joint resolution at the last session of Congress.

I desire to present to the Senate the plan of work of this commission and the program which it will seek to carry out, together with indorsements of the work.

Among these indorsements are expressions taken from the national platforms of each of the three great political parties commending efforts to improve rural credits and agricultural finance, also a letter from ex-President Roosevelt, a short speech from President Taft, and a letter from the next President, together with short speeches from Senator FLETCHER and Sir Horace Plunkett upon the same subject.

There are also several other short matters in this material which I am presenting to the Senate, and as I do not wish to mention them in detail, I have submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that he might see what they are and approve them.

Although the work of this commission is to be borne by private expense, it is one which might well have been provided for from the National Treasury.

I can not too highly express my own appreciation of the proposed work of this commission, and I ask that the papers which I present be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks that the papers which he has presented, the nature of which he has indicated, may be printed as a public document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the words "North Dakota," to strike out the colon and all of the bill down to and including line 23, on page 3, and to insert ", in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., a railway corporation organized under the laws of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota, its successors or assigns, to build a railway bridge across the Yellowstone River from a point on the east bank in section 15 to a point on the west bank in section 16, township 151 north of range 104 west of the fifth principal meridian, in McKenzie County, N. Dak., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GRONNA. I now call up Senate bill 8090, providing for the building of a railroad bridge across the Missouri River, N. Dak., and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 8090) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the Missouri River from a point on the east bank in section 14, Mountrail County, N. Dak., to a point on the west bank of said river in section 15, in McKenzie County, N. Dak., in township 152 north, range 93 west of the fifth principal meridian, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 5, after the word "meridian," to strike out:

Provided, That the plans for the construction of said bridge and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of the construction of such bridge: And provided further, That said Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., its successors or assigns, shall not deviate from such plans after such approval, either before or after the completion of the said bridge, unless the modification of said plans shall have previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War, and any changes in said bridge which the Secretary of War may at any time order in the interest of navigation shall be promptly made by said company at its own expense.

SEC. 2. That in case any litigation arises from the building of said bridge or from the obstruction of said river by said bridge, cases may be tried in the proper courts, as now provided for that purpose in the State of North Dakota and in the courts of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of law now existing in reference to the protection of the navigation of rivers, or to exempt said bridge from the operation of same.

SEC. 3. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same and over the approaches thereto upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case of disagreement between the parties in regard to the compensation to be paid or the conditions to be observed all matters at issue shall be determined by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure and shall be recognized and known as a post route upon which no higher charge shall be made for the transmission of mails and the troops and munitions of war of the United States over the same than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or approaches leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph and telephone purposes.

And to insert:

In accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

So as to read:

That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., a railway corporation organized under the laws of the State of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota, its successors and assigns, to build a railway bridge across the Missouri River from a point on the east bank of section 14, Mountrail County, N. Dak., to a point on the west bank of said river in section 15, in McKenzie County, N. Dak., in township 152 north, range 93 west, of the fifth principal meridian, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6 (3), page 4, line 8, after the word "hereby," to insert "expressly," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSIT OF PUBLIC MONEYS IN NATIONAL BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 462) submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 10th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching his authority to make the order for the disposition, custody, and disbursement of the public moneys embodied in department circular No. 5, issued by said Secretary of the Treasury on January 9, 1913; also to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching the effect of said order upon the system and mode of receiving, caring for, handling, and disbursing said public moneys in effect prior to the issuance of said order, and especially what change in said system was effected by said order; also any information in his possession as to the manner and in what proportion the public moneys specified in said order are distributed among the several national banks therein referred to, and to designate what, if any, additional banks have been designated as Government depositories on account of the change in the custody of the public moneys specified in said order, and where the same are located; also the amount of daily receipts of the Government which have been deposited in banks since said order went into effect, and what, if any, security therefor or interest thereon has been required by said Secretary of the Treasury from the said banks, and what amount or proportion of said daily receipts has been deposited in banks in New York City; also to state the monthly average amount of all funds in the custody of disbursing officers which said order requires to be deposited in banks, but which prior thereto were deposited with the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States; also what is the average monthly amount of United States disbursing officers' accounts in New York City.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in explanation of this resolution, I desire to add a few words to what I said on yesterday, when it was introduced, as to the question of whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury has the discretion of directing that these vast sums of money shall be deposited in private banks. The accounts of the disbursing officers of the Government in cities where there are subtreasuries or the Treasury of the United States amount to more than $400,000,000. The resolution which I submitted on yesterday, and which is now before the Senate, requires of the Secretary of the Treasury information as to his authority in the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. On that point of authority, as the Senator was cut off on yesterday, I could not then call his attention to the statutory provision. There is no question about the removal of the restrictions. In what was known as the Aldrich-Vreeland Act section 5153 of the Revised Statutes was amended. Section 5153 of the Revised Statutes provides:

SEC. 5153. All national banking associations, designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositaries of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary.

When that section was amended by the act to amend the national banking act, approved March 4, 1907, it was amended so as to read:

All national banking associations designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be depositories of public money under such regulations.

Thus taking out the exception of the customs receipts. I have looked with some care to see if there was any other provision, and I find there is no other provision except this one, which removes the restriction and brings them within the general class of public money which can be deposited at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in duly authorized depositories of public money.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply desire to say to the Senator that while he is discussing the question I wish to call his particular attention to the circular No. 5, referred to by him yesterday, and to state that it only applies to banks designated as special depositories of public money, and other depositories are not affected by circular No. 5. Its provisions only apply to those banks designated as active depositories, and therefore, if the Senator will take that into consideration, no doubt he will immediately see that the statement made by him as to the amounts daily deposited in these particular banks is not what he says they would be.

Mr. STONE. How much are they?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I really do not know; I have not had time to look it up; but it is only a very few banks where such moneys are deposited, and therefore all the customs receipts can not be included. The Senator from Massachusetts has already called attention to the fact that section 5153, the original section, was reenacted in 1907, eliminating the words——

Mr. LODGE. Eliminating the restriction in regard to customs receipts.

Mr. SMOOT. Eliminating the restriction in regard to customs receipts—"except receipts from customs." Those words were left out of the act of 1907.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would the Senator designate an "active depository"?

Mr. SMOOT. That is designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand there are depositories in every State in the Union. The Senator used the words "active depository." Why is not every bank that has deposits of money in it an active depository?

Mr. SMOOT. They are not all active depositories. For instance, I will call the Senator's attention to the depository in his own city—no doubt there is one there, and perhaps more than one—but such banks are not active depositories. When a bank has a hundred thousand dollars or fifty thousand dollars of Government deposits, as the case may be, such deposits are hardly ever drawn on; there is hardly any change ever made; and their amount is only augmented by the receipts that may come from local collections.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I want to get at is, What is an "active depository"?

Mr. SMOOT. An illustration would be a depository in the city of New York, where customs receipts are received and where transfers are made rapidly every day, perhaps.

Mr. OVERMAN. It means, then, that "active depositories" are only located in the great cities of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. That would be about the effect of it; yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I presume that during the time since this resolution was introduced the Senator from Massachusetts, who has paid attention to the subject, has investigated the matter more or less carefully. He cited one section of the law of 1907, which he says authorizes the order made by the Secretary of the Treasury. That section of the law of 1907, as he points out, amends section 5153 of the Revised Statutes. Now, I should like to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator from Massachusetts to another section of the Revised Statutes, not affected in any way by the law which he cites or by any other law that has been passed. I refer to section 3620, which provides:

SEC. 3620. It shall be the duty of every disbursing officer having any public money intrusted to him for disbursement, to deposit the same with the Treasurer or some one of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and to draw for the same only as it may be required for payments to be made by him in pursuance of law; and all transfers from the Treasurer of the United States to a disbursing officer shall be by draft or warrant on the Treasury or an assistant treasurer of the United States.

Then there is an exception to that to the following effect:

In places, however, where there is no treasurer or assistant treasurer, the Secretary of the Treasury may, when he deems it essential to the public interest, specially authorize in writing the deposit of such public money in any other public depository.

What the Secretary of the Treasury has done in this case is to undertake to extend the authority conferred upon him by section 3620 of the Revised Statutes in cities where there is no subtreasury to cities where there is a subtreasury, in which cities the statute in a most mandatory manner directs that the disbursing officers shall keep their funds in the subtreasury located there.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to call the Senator's attention to an amendment to the section which he has just read. If he will turn to section 5488, he will notice that——

Mr. POINDEXTER. My attention was diverted. To what section did the Senator refer?

Mr. SMOOT. Section 5488 of the Revised Statutes. If the Senator will turn to that section, he will see that it reads:

Every disbursing officer of the United States who deposits any public money intrusted to him in any place or in any manner "except as authorized by law"—

If the Senator will notice, those words are an amendment of the section to which he referred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, of course I respect the opinion of the Senator from Utah, but I must say that this language can not possibly be an amendment to section 3620. It deals with a different subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just let me finish the sentence. Furthermore, the exception to which the Senator calls attention, "except as provided by law," does not touch the question at all, because the very contention I am making is that it is expressly provided by law that the disbursing officers can not deposit the public funds in their possession in private banks in cities where there is a subtreasury.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the act of March 4, 1907, like all other acts, whether expressly or not, repeals any act or parts of acts inconsistent therewith. So far as section 5488 is inconsistent with it, of course it is repealed by the later act.

If the Senator will look at the index in the volume of the statutes, he will see that the reference to the act contains this statement:

Restriction on the deposit of customs receipts in national banks removed.

And it gives this section. That being removed, of course, no earlier act can possibly interfere with it. If it is inconsistent, it is repealed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is not inconsistent. It does not conflict with the other section in any way at all, because it deals with a different subject matter. The section of the law to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers relates to the deposit of customs receipts. The section of the law to which I refer relates to an entirely different subject, the accounts of disbursing officers, which contain moneys transferred and intrusted to the disbursing officers from all the receipts of the Government. The place of deposit of the receipts from the customs, when they are received, is one subject. I differ from the Senator as to the effect of the law of 1907, even as to the deposit of customs receipts. But that has no relation whatever to the requirement as to the place where the accounts of disbursing officers shall be kept, and consequently can not repeal it by implication.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether he will accept an amendment to his resolution, to render it a little more specific and to gather further information which may be of assistance? I propose to add:

Also a list of the national banks authorized to receive national deposits, public moneys, or postal-savings funds, and the amount on deposit in each December 31, 1912.

So that we may have a definite and clear statement of the condition as it existed on the first of the year.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and acted upon at the proper time.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow the resolution to be reported now, as amended, so that we can get it in our minds?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as part of the original resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have it read so that we can see just what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching his authority to make the order for the disposition, custody, and disbursement of the public moneys embodied in department circular No. 5, issued by said Secretary of the Treasury on January 9, 1913; also to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching the effect of said order upon the system and mode of receiving, caring for, handling, and disbursing said public moneys in effect prior to the issuance of said order, and especially what change in said system was effected by said order; also any information in his possession as to the manner and in what proportion the public moneys specified in said order are distributed among the several national banks therein referred to, and to designate what, if any, additional banks have been designated as Government depositories on account of the change in the custody of the public moneys specified in said order, and where the same are located; also the amount of daily receipts of the Government which have been deposited in banks since said order went into effect, and what, if any, security therefor or interest thereon has been required by said Secretary of the Treasury from the said banks, and what amount or proportion of said daily receipts has been deposited in banks in New York City; also to state the monthly average amount of all funds in the custody of disbursing officers which said order requires to be deposited in banks, but which prior thereto were deposited with the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer of the United States; also what is the average monthly amount of United States disbursing officers' accounts in New York City; also a list of the national banks authorized to receive national deposits, public moneys, or postal savings funds, and the amount on deposit in each December 31, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the information called for in the latter part of the resolution as read, which I believe is his amendment, is all in print, and can be given him in five minutes' time, although I am not objecting if he wants it in this general report. I simply want to tell the Senator that it is all in print, and can be had in a very few minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I presume it is in print in a certain form, but I suggest it as an appropriate item of information to go with the Senator's resolution, because it fixes a certain date and, I think, will be helpful to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the least objection to the amendment, nor have I any objection to the resolution. The resolution can pass now, so far as any objection on my part is concerned.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I shall not proceed much further, but I should like to answer now the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah that this order will not have the effect of changing the place of deposit of very large sums of the public money. I have noticed the statement from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury that money would be drawn out as fast as it would be put in. That was the substance of it—that the daily expenditures out of these funds, through checks cashed by private banks where they were deposited, would amount to as much as the daily receipts. But that does not affect the question in any way at all. You might reverse the statement and say that the daily receipts would equal the daily expenditures, so the balance of the account would remain the same.

The simple fact, which all of the argument and all of the sophistry in the world can not avoid, is that there is a million dollars or more of customs receipts, for one thing, that heretofore has been deposited in currency and coin in the subtreasury that under this order will be deposited daily in the national banks. It does not make any difference whether they are inactive depositories or whether they are active depositories. The matter of creating depositories is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. I imagine that a great many banks that were indifferent about it before, now that this vast sum of money is to be distributed among the banks, will be making application to the Secretary of the Treasury to be designated as Government depositories, so that they will be eligible to receive a large portion of these funds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to misunderstand the statement I made. Of course during the whole year there will probably pass through these banks, as he suggests, $400,000,000. But the balances at any particular time, on any particular day of the year, will never exceed the customs receipts on that day.

In other words, if the customs receipts are $1,500,000 a day, they are deposited in special depositories on that particular day; but checks are immediately drawn upon them. The account is an active one. It is the same as if the Senator himself had an account in which he was depositing every day and drawing his personal checks against his deposits. So far as the amount of money is concerned, there will be very little money left on any particular day in the year. That is what I should like the Senator to direct his remarks to if he misunderstood my former statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not misunderstand the former statement of the Senator. Everybody knows the contingencies to which checking accounts are subject. Every Government disbursing officer constantly has a balance on hand, and that balance fluctuates. It is being replenished, it is being reduced. It is a very large average balance. The customs receipts, which are subject to the same suggestion just made by the Senator from Utah, are a million dollars a day. If a million dollars is drawn out, a million dollars is put in, so that the average balance is a million dollars.

Reverting again to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the law of 1907 amending the Revised Statutes as to customs receipts does not in any way specifically undertake to authorize the deposit in national-bank depositories of any other kind of public moneys than those which were authorized before. It is true that it leaves out a certain exception; but there were certain specific prohibitions as to what funds could be deposited in national-bank depositories, and those prohibitions are not amended or repealed. When a statute is passed which says that public moneys, in those words, in that most general form of expression, may be deposited in national-bank depositories, it means such public moneys as the law authorizes to be deposited there.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to two facts:

Away back in 1846, I think, a law was passed prohibiting the deposit of any public moneys in banks. That took the money out of circulation. It put it into the subtreasury and took it out of circulation. In the sixties—I think in 1864—we amended the law so that the internal-revenue receipts were to be deposited in the banks. The restriction against depositing customs receipts was found in section 5153 of the Revised Statutes. That exception as to customs receipts was eliminated by this amendatory section of the act of 1907. But, aside from that, I think it is strictly within the law now to deposit customs receipts as much as internal-revenue receipts.

I want to call the Senator's attention to this fact: Two of the great vices of our financial system have been, first, the lack of sufficient elasticity in our paper currency, and the next, the fact that our subtreasury system has taken the revenues of the Government and put them into the subtreasuries, hoarded them there, piled them up, and taken them out of the channels of commerce and trade. In all other countries—in France, in Germany, in England, and in the minor countries—the receipts of the Government are put into a large bank, they are checked against, and the money of the country remains in circulation in the channels of trade. Under our artificial subtreasury system those receipts have been taken out of the channels of trade and hoarded up until we have had as much as $300,000,000 of surplus, and what has been the result? The result has been that at the times when we have been threatened with panics, or have had any financial stress in the country, people have come to the Treasury Department and have said, "For God's sake, deposit in the banks some of this money that is in the subtreasuries."

Under this law, and under the recent rules of the Treasury Department, we have finally come to the same basis as the other countries of the world, and that is that the fiscal affairs of the country are transacted through the banks of the country. The money goes into the channels of commerce and trade, and moves through them instead of being piled up in the Treasury. If the Senator would stop to consider the financial systems of other countries and compare them with our old and obsolete subtreasury system he would see the necessity for this change. We never can put our financial system on a safe basis till we adopt the system whereby the receipts of the Government go into the banks of the country and remain in circulation and are checked against in that way.

Otherwise it is just as though the Senator from Washington should put all the money he received in the course of a year into a safe, and keep it locked up all the year, and keep that money out of circulation. It would do nobody any good. That is exactly what transpires under our subtreasury system. We corrected it, as I said, in 1864, I think, by allowing internal-revenue receipts to be put there. Now, under this legislation we allow the customs receipts to be put there. I think it is a great progress and a great step in advance in our financial system. If we can only change our paper currency so as to make it more elastic, we shall put ourselves on a par with the other great countries of the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the speech just made by the Senator from Minnesota would be very applicable to a discussion in the Senate of a change in the fiscal policy of the Government, but it is not applicable to the question as to whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury, without any legislation, without such a discussion, without hearing the views of the Senator from Minnesota and the Members of both branches of Congress, may make this order in his own discretion, upon his own authority, revolutionizing the fiscal policy of the Government, and, as stated in the circular issued by the National City Bank of New York, undertaking to do it under the very statute which that circular says was supposed to prohibit the thing that he has done.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator let me interrupt him a moment further?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to make any extended remarks. I call the Senator's attention to section 5153 as it is found in the Revised Statutes:

> All national banking associations designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be depositaries of public money, except receipts from customs.

That is the language of the Revised Statutes.

By the act of March 4, 1907, that section is reenacted and that exception is eliminated. So that in fact national banks if they are designated as depositaries are lawful custodians of customs receipts as well as internal-revenue receipts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That has no application whatever to the $400,000,000 that are paid out by the disbursing officers of the Government in cities where there are subtreasuries. Section 3639 of the Revised Statutes, as far as it is applicable to this question, is as follows:

> The Treasurer of the United States, all assistant treasurers, and those performing the duties of assistant treasurers, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs, acting also as collectors, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, all postmasters, and all public officers of whatsoever character are required to keep safely, without loaning, using, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as specially allowed by law, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered, by the proper department or officer of the Government, to be transferred or paid out.

Section 3620 is still more specific. It provides that—

> It shall be the duty of every disbursing officer having any public money intrusted to him for disbursement to deposit the same with the Treasurer or some one of the assistant treasurers of the United States.

To indicate that the Secretary of the Treasury is fully aware of the statute I have just read and recognizes that it is still in force, we have only to turn to the forms of the checks and certificates of deposit and to the name of the account which he has devised in this circular No. 5 to conduct the business of the Government under this new system.

The checks drawn by the disbursing officers are drawn on the Treasurer of the United States. Why? Because the law requires the account to be kept with the Treasurer of the United States. Where are they presented? Where are they paid? They are presented at the national banks. They are paid by the national banks. The money is in the national banks. The account is the account of a disbursing officer, but it is listed in the bank as the Treasurer's account in order to make it in form comply with section 3620 of the Revised Statutes, while in fact it does not comply with it but is a direct violation of it, because the money, which is the account spoken of in the law, is on deposit in the bank when the law says it shall not be on deposit there.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. STONE. This is a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report certain information to the Senate. I assume there is no opposition to the passage of the resolution, and when the information comes in we can discuss it. I think it is a very timely resolution. I should like very much to see it adopted, and I have no doubt it will be unanimously agreed to. But in looking it over I fear it does not call for one thing I should like to have, and that is the exact reason or reasons that influenced the Secretary of the Treasury to make the order.

I suggest to the Senator from Washington an amendment which I have prepared, in line 8, after the word "Senate," to insert the words "the reason or reasons for the making of such order and," so that it will read:

Also to transmit to the Senate the reason or reasons for the making of such order and any information in his possession touching the effect.

And so forth.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington accept the amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept the amendment and submit the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as it has been amended by agreement.

The SECRETARY. Insert, after the word "Senate," in line 8, the words "the reasons for making such order and," so that it will read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession touching his authority to make the order for the disposition, custody, and disbursement of the public moneys embodied in department circular No. 5, issued by said Secretary of the Treasury on January 9, 1913; also to transmit to the Senate the reasons for making such order and any information in his possession taking the effect of said order, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CRAWFORD submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "$22,231.38"; and the Senate agree to the same.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the agreement requires that Senate bill 8033 be laid before the Senate for its consideration and action.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me to make a request out of order, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Porto Rico Review on the subject of granting American citizenship to Porto Ricans, a question which is now pending in this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article the nature of which he has stated.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the article is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an editorial on the question of granting American citizenship to the inhabitants of Porto Rico, printed in the Porto Rico Review.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asks that it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection unless the morning business would be reopened. I do not want to violate the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would have to sustain the objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it could be done without reopening the morning business, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain the request of the Senator from Washington. The Senate is limited to the matters embraced in the unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator from Connecticut is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Gamble	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Bourne	Gardner	Oliver	Sutherland
Brady	Gore	Overman	Swanson

Mr. WEBB. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 65 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Alabama is about to debate the Connecticut River bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me to dispose of a conference report, so that the matter may go back into conference? The unanimous-consent agreement provides for such business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How long will it take?

Mr. WARREN. I hope it will take only a minute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I may be allowed to do so under the agreement, and if the Senator insists, I will yield, although I do not like to do it.

Mr. WARREN. If it is a matter that will lead to extended debate, I will drop it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the conference report made on yesterday on House bill 26680, being the legislative appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report which was submitted to the Senate and printed and which is a partial agreement is before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments in disagreement and ask for a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, before approaching the discussion of this subject, I desire to say to the Senate that I have no personal or pecuniary interest whatever in any water-power company, nor have I any interest in any public-utility company of any character. Therefore the only interest I feel in the final disposition of this question leads to a desire on my part to protect, as far as may be, the interests and the rights of the States and the property owners therein.

I send to the Secretary's desk an amendment which the majority of the Committee on Commerce offer to the pending bill, and I ask that the Secretary read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by striking out of section 1, beginning after the word "act," in line 15, on page 2, the following:

And provided further, That the rights and privileges hereby granted may be assigned with the written authorization of the Secretary of War, or in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, but not otherwise: And provided further, That the Secretary of War, as a part of the conditions and stipulations referred to in said act, may, in his discretion, impose a reasonable annual charge or return, to be paid by the said corporation or its assigns to the United States, the proceeds thereof to be used for the development of navigation on the Connecticut River and the waters connected therewith. In fixing such charge, if any, the Secretary of War shall take into consideration the existing rights and property of said corporation and the amounts spent and required to be spent by it in improving the navigation of said river, and no charge shall be imposed which shall be such as to deprive the said corporation of a reasonable return on the fair value of such dam and appurtenant works and property, allowing for the cost of construction, maintenance, and renewal, and for depreciation charges.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, of course the majority of the Committee on Commerce will exercise its rights under the rules and practice of the Senate to perfect the pending bill before other amendments are acted upon. The majority of the committee are opposed to the provisions contained in the amendment and assign, as their reasons, in part the following:

First. The Federal Government having no right to control the use of water power in the Connecticut River, it can not legally legislate on the subject of control.

Second. A valuable resource of the State will be practically confiscated.

Third. The control, regulation, and disposition of water power in the Connecticut River being questions of State policy, Congress has no right to demand compensation in any form.

Fourth. The Federal Government has no right to withhold a permit for the construction of a dam, because it will not interfere with navigation, but improve it.

Fifth. If the Secretary of War is given authority and discretion to fix the amount of charge to be collected, it is an attempt to delegate to the head of a department the power to levy and collect taxes, a function which belongs to Congress alone.

Mr. President, there can be no question but that the amount sought to be collected from the Connecticut River Co. is a tax; it can not be construed in any other way. If it is a tax, Congress has no constitutional power or authority to delegate that power to the Secretary of War or to any other subordinate. If that power can be exercised by Congress, it may as well delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to levy and collect duties on imports at his own will and discretion; if it may delegate the taxing power to a subordinate of the Government for one purpose, it may do so for all purposes; it may delegate the power to the Director of the Mint, for instance, to coin money and, in his own discretion, to fix the value and the fineness of the coin. There is no limit, Mr. President, to this delegation of power if it can be constitutionally exercised at all.

I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I attempt to reply to the argument of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] when he addressed the Senate a few days ago on this bill. The Secretary of War and the Senator from Ohio proclaim that whatever the Government can legally and constitutionally do it may do by an agent. Mr. President, I concede that; but I insist that what the Government can not legally and constitutionally do, it can not do that illegal and unconstitutional act by its agent.

The Senator from Ohio, in attempting to maintain his position as to the right of the General Government to levy and collect a tax, or if you prefer to call it a toll, upon water powers in the United States where a dam, the land, and other appurtenant works are owned and constructed by private parties, in my judgment signally failed in the effort.

The Senator from Ohio, in the discussion of the question, called the attention of the Senate to a number of bills. His references are to be found on page 111 of the document I hold in my hand—Federal Control of Water Power—and will also be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of his remarks. He undertook to criticize the majority of the Committee on Commerce for the declaration that no law of Congress had ever been enacted authorizing, as is proposed in the pending bill, the Government to levy and collect a toll. All the committee intended was that no law of Congress had ever authorized the collection of a toll for the use of the surplus waters of a navigable river where the structure was erected by private enterprise, and that no act of Congress authorizing the collection of a toll at any dam anywhere in the United States can be found except where the Government itself constructed the work and was the riparian owner.

The Senator from Ohio cited a number of cases which he claimed established his contention, and among them was the Muskingum River, in the Senator's own State. The provisions of that bill are that—

The Secretary of War be authorized and empowered to grant leases or licenses for the use of the water powers, at such rate and on such conditions and for such periods of time as may seem to him just, equitable, and expedient.

Mr. President, the lock and dam there belongs exclusively to the United States. It was at one time the property of the State of Ohio or of private owners. The Government bought it and paid for it and, consequently, took over all the rights that the State of Ohio had and all the rights that the riparian owners had. So it is not a parallel case at all. No one, perhaps, will contend that the Government of the United States may not collect a reasonable amount for the use of a structure that it may build, thereby creating a power; but nobody who has investigated this question thoroughly will say that the Federal Government can legally collect a toll or a tax for surplus water, or otherwise, in a river where the title to the dam and the land is in private parties. That is our contention. The case of the Green and Barren Rivers is similar. The Cumberland and Tennessee is also a similar case; in fact, Mr. President, all the cases referred to by the Senator tend to establish the contention of the majority of the committee, that the Federal Government has never asserted ownership in the surplus water of a navigable river except where it was riparian owner, and, therefore, has nothing to sell.

I want to call particular attention to one of the references made by the Senator from Ohio—the Cumberland and its tributaries. In that instance Congress authorized private parties to construct a lock and dam, giving them the power to collect toll from every vessel, barge, or other craft that went through the lock, the rates, of course, to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and at the expiration of 40 years its owners are to transfer the lock and dam to the Government free of cost, retaining ownership of the dam and all the power rights and privileges to themselves. That is another case cited to establish the contention of the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

I have endeavored to show, and I think I have shown, that there have been no dams or locks constructed by private parties, who are the riparian owners, where the Government has ever insisted it was entitled to compensation or toll for its use, except in all cases it has been required, perhaps—and it should be required—that the power company shall furnish current to operate the lock and light the dam. It is perfectly proper that the Government should require power companies to furnish power to operate the locks, because it is a part of the navigation of the stream; but beyond that requirement the Government has never gone and has never attempted to go.

Mr. President, how can the Government acquire property for the construction of a lock and dam on a navigable river? What do they acquire when, by purchase or condemnation, they have secured a site upon which a lock and dam may be erected in aid of navigation?

I assert as a correct principle that the Federal Government can not go into any of the sovereign States of the Union and condemn a site for a lock and dam for any purpose except navigation; and when they have so condemned it they can not use it for any purpose except navigation. In this contention the majority of your committee are sustained by a number of decisions.

I want to read briefly from a case in the Forty-third Southern Reporter, page 791, bearing directly on this question:

This case arose in my own State, where a railroad company condemned the right of way over which to construct its road, and during the construction a valuable sand bank was discovered. When the road was completed and in operation the railroad people undertook to sell the sand for a profit. The original owner from whom the lands had been taken came into court and said: "You can not use that right of way for any purpose except that which is required to operate your road. Whatever else of value may be there belongs to me, from whom you originally took the land." The court very promptly decided that he was entitled to whatever of profit the railroad had derived from the sale of the sand and required the road to pay him for it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Alabama does not maintain that that is at all analogous to this case, does he? That is a statement of an elementary principle which we all recognize. The other, the condemnation for navigation, involves the development of a water power incidental to the main purpose. The case of the sand bank is something entirely distinct. It is not a part of the operation of the railroad.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think it is entirely analogous. This road was built for the development of commerce over the road. The river is improved for the development of commerce over the river. It seems to me the principle is the same.

But in another case, Sixty-sixth Iowa, page 606 (55 Am. Rep., 281), the court held that stone taken from the cut through which a railroad was built, not necessary for the construction of the road, belonged to the original owner from whom the land was acquired, and when the railroad company undertook to sell it as a matter of merchandise or commerce, the court said, "No; you did not condemn anything but the right of way, and you have no interest there but for a right of way. Whatever else there may be of value belongs to the original owner," and the court compelled the road to pay to the original owner the market value of the stone that had been sold by the railroad.

If the Government of the United States can go to Colorado or to Connecticut or to Alabama and condemn a site for a lock and dam under the commerce clause of the Constitution, does anybody believe for a moment that it could use that site for any other purpose than navigation? Does any Senator believe that the Government could go on that site and erect a Government distillery, for instance, or any other commercial or business enterprise it might choose? Why, certainly not. And if they did, under all the decisions of all the courts, the Government would be required to pay to the original owner from whom the land was condemned for navigation purposes whatever profit it received beyond its use for navigation.

Mr. President, the right to regulate and supervise and control properly belongs to the States. I anticipate that all the States of this Union have laws and public service commissions—and if they have not, they will very soon come to it—perfectly competent to deal with this question and to regulate all the affairs and business of a water-power corporation or any other public utility corporation that may be doing business in the State.

To whom does the water in the Connecticut River belong? Does it belong to the Federal Government, or does it belong to the State of Connecticut and the riparian owners in that State? What right or interest has the Government in the waters of that river beyond what is necessary for navigation in the river? If it has no legal right, if it has no moral right, to appropriate it to its own use for a profit, then we have no power whatever to pass this bill as reported to the Senate.

Mr. President, I want to show the Senate, if I can, how great minds change on a subject of this sort. I want to read from a report bearing directly on the question now under consideration made by Gen. Mackenzie to the Secretary of War for his approval.

The Chief of Engineers, at that time Gen. Mackenzie, was perhaps one of the ablest of that corps. When he came to report on this question he said what I am about to read:

> In connection with legislation of this kind careful consideration should be given to the question of the limitations of the power of the Federal Government over navigable waters. By virtue of its power to regulate commerce, Congress may exercise control over the navigable waters of the United States, but only to the extent necessary to protect, preserve, and improve free navigation. The Federal Government has no possessory title to the water flowing in navigable streams, nor to the land comprising their beds and shores, and hence Congress can grant no absolute authority to anyone to use and occupy such water and land for manufacturing and industrial purposes. The establishment, regulation, and control of manufacturing and industrial enterprises, as well as other matters pertaining to the comfort, convenience, and prosperity of the people, come within the powers of the States, and the Supreme Court of the United States holds that the authority of a State over navigable waters within its borders, and the shores and beds thereof, is plenary, subject only to such action as Congress may take in the execution of its powers under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States.

That report of Gen. Mackenzie went to the Secretary of War, who is now the President of the United States, and here is what he said in an indorsement approving the report:

> WAR DEPARTMENT,
> Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, inviting attention to the accompanying report of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, of yesterday's date, and to drafts of bills therein referred to. The report seems to me to be very comprehensive, accurate, and instructive.

That was the opinion of the Secretary of War at that time.

I desire now to read again from the President of the United States while Secretary of War in an opinion on the Des Plaines River case, where application was made that the department should not interfere with a private dam:

> The department is not going to take any action, and has not taken any action. The advisory step, taken at the instance of Mr. Snapp, or the persons who intended to put some sort of water-power construction in the Des Plaines River, was extra official, and really was beyond the authority of the Chief of Engineers, except as he was accommodating to express an opinion in the interest of explanation. The truth is that the Des Plaines River not being a navigable stream, no permit was necessary to put any obstruction into it which the War Department could prevent. But even if it had been a navigable stream, and even if the application had been made and properly made to this department to say whether this would interfere with navigation, if the department concluded it would not interfere with navigation then it is not within the power of the department to withhold its expressing such an opinion and granting such a permit, so far as the United States is concerned, for the purpose of aiding the State in controlling the water power. If the State has any control over the water power which it may exercise in conflict with the claimed rights of the riparian owner, then it must exercise it itself, through its own legislation and through its own executive officers. All the United States does, assuming it to be a navigable stream, is merely to protect the navigation of the stream. With reference to the water power, it has no function except in respect to water power which it itself creates by its own investment in property that it itself owns; and then, of course, it may say how that water power shall be used.
> But with respect to the water power on a navigable stream, which may be exercised without interference with the use of the river for navigation purposes, that is controlled by the laws of the State. It is controlled by the riparian ownership and by the common law as it governs those rights. Therefore I do not see, with reference to this matter, that this department has any function to perform or which it can perform.

Again, the Secretary of War says:

> There are two answers to that. The department is not going to take any action, and has not taken any action.

The department is not going to issue a permit, because it has no business to do it. It has no authority to do it unless navigation is interfered with.

> The application * * * is for this department to take no official action which may interfere with the State control of the water power which may be developed in the Des Plaines River under a proposed improvement by the construction of a 14-foot waterway; and also to take no action which may interfere with the waterway as a waterway.

One more quotation. Now, listen, Mr. President:

> It is not that we approve this; it is not that we disapprove it. It is that we have nothing whatever to do with it.

Nothing to do with what? Granting a permit for the construction of a dam on a navigable river where navigation is amply provided for.

> That is the truth of it. If the State wishes to control the matter of the water power, then it is for the legislature, through which it can express that view, in so far as it may constitutionally effect it by legislation.

That is the opinion of the Secretary of War, speaking as a great judge, as one who had been on the bench for many years and had been called on many times to construe the Constitution and the laws enacted under it.

Mr. President, the other day I had the Secretary read, for the information of the Senate, a paragraph from the report of the National Waterways Commission. I want to insert this in the RECORD, and therefore I intend to read it as a part of my remarks. It will be observed that this report was made by a commission composed of Senators and Representatives, appointed for the express purpose of inquiring into the very question that we are now discussing, and to determine what the interests of the Government and the State and the riparian owners were in the navigable waters of the United States.

Here is what they said:

> The commission is of the opinion that the Federal Government has no proprietary right or interest in navigable waters which would authorize the collection of tolls. The right, if it exists at all, rests upon either the second or third theory stated. As regards the second theory, it should be said that the imposition of tolls, unless based upon a more substantial foundation than the mere authority to grant or withhold consent—an authority arising solely from the control of the Federal Government for the purposes of navigation—does not commend itself to the commission, and it is to be doubted whether, even in case a bill should be passed or other action taken by Congress for granting this permission, with a provision for charging tolls, such tolls could be collected.

That was the unanimous opinion of this commission.

Now, Mr. President, in connection with what I have read I wish to read the names of the Members composing this commission in order that the Senate may judge how able they were to deal with this question and therefore can place the greatest confidence in their conclusions. The members of the commission were THEODORE E. BURTON, chairman; JACOB H. GALLINGER, from New Hampshire, vice chairman; Samuel H. Piles, WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, F. M. SIMMONS, William Lorimer, JAMES P. CLARKE, D. S. Alexander, FREDERICK C. STEVENS, Irving P. Wanger, S. M. SPARKMAN, and JOHN A. MOON.

Mr. President, when that declaration was read the other day the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in reply said, "Well, I have changed my mind since then." It appears that the Secretary of War, now the President, has also changed his mind on this question. However, the fact remains, although these gentlemen have changed their minds, the Constitution has not changed. It is the same now as it was when these views were expressed, and there is no means of changing it that I know of except to submit an amendment to the States for their ratification.

Now, so much for that. I have read in the presence of the Senate the views of the Secretary of War indorsing the report of the Chief of Engineers, and I do not deem it necessary to pursue that branch of the subject any further.

I wish to quote another authority briefly on the question of the rights of riparian owners, and I read from Kent's Commentaries. In discussing the rights of the riparian owner Chancellor Kent said:

Every proprietor of lands on the banks of a river has naturally an equal right to the use of the water which flows in the stream adjacent to his lands, as it was wont to run (currere solebat), without diminution or alteration. No proprietor has a right to use the water to the prejudice of other proprietors above or below him unless he has a prior right to divert it or a title to some exclusive enjoyment. He has no property in the water itself, but a simple usufruct while it passes along. Aqua currit et debet currere ut solebat is the language of the law. (b) Though he may use the water while it runs over his land as an incident to the land, he can not unreasonably detain it or give it another direction, and he must return it to its ordinary channel when it leaves his estate. Without the consent of the adjoining proprietors he can not divert or diminish the quantity of water which would otherwise descend to the proprietors below, nor throw the water back upon the proprietors above without a grant or an uninterrupted enjoyment of 20 years, which is evidence of it. (c) This is the clear and settled general doctrine on the subject, and all the difficulty that arises consists in the application. The owner must so use and apply the water as to work no material injury or annoyance to his neighbor below him, who has an equal right to the subsequent use of the same water; nor can he by dams or any obstruction cause the water injuriously to overflow the grounds and springs of his neighbor above him.

Those are the views of this eminent author on the rights of the riparian owner. Of course, all this is subject to the right of navigation.

Mr. Farnham, in his work on "Waters and Water Rights," says:

Conflict between riparian and navigation rights: The right of an individual to use a waterway for the purpose of navigation comes to him as one of the public, and he has no more rights than belong to the public in the use of a public highway, unless he is a riparian owner on the stream, when his rights may depend on different principles. Waterways constituting the highways lie along land the title to which is usually in private individuals, and in many instances the individuals have the title to the bed over which the water flows. This contiguity to the water gives certain rights which belong to the owner of the land as an individual and not as one of the public. With these rights the public can not interfere. They are private property within the protection of the constitutional provisions against taking property for public use without compensation. The rights of a member of the public are no greater than those of the entire public, so that the individual, in exercising his rights of navigation, must respect the rights of the owner of the bank. But the public right of way is paramount. That is the principal use of the stream when it is navigable, and other rights must give way to it so far as necessary to preserve the right of navigation. This does not mean that the riparian owner can make no use of the stream or its bed which will in any way interfere with the right of navigation. Such a requirement would be unreasonable, because during large portions of the year the stream may not be capable of navigation, and at such times it would be unreasonable to deprive the riparian owner of the opportunity to utilize the water power in the stream or to erect barriers to the passage of stock or make other reasonable uses of the property. In many cases, also, a little yielding of absolute right by both interests will permit both to obtain greater benefit from the stream. When it is said that the right of the public is paramount, nothing more is meant than that the riparian owner can do nothing to close the highway. He can not divert the water from the stream nor consume it so as to defeat the possibility of navigation, nor can he place insuperable obstructions in the stream. Conversely, the right of public navigation is not such as to destroy the rights of the riparian owner. The right can not be exercised to the unnecessary or wanton destruction of private rights or so as to deprive riparian proprietors of the use of the stream for legitimate purposes which will not unreasonably interfere with the right of navigation. The navigation right is a right of passage merely, and so long as that right is preserved without unreasonable impairment the riparian owner may bridge the stream or use water therefrom, or even throw a dam across it, if he makes provision for the right of passage. The rights may be said to be reciprocal, each modifying the other, each to be used so as not to interfere unreasonably with the other right. The riparian owner is not bound to provide a better passage than is furnished by nature. He may even abridge the rights to some extent if he leaves a convenient passageway.

Now, Mr. President, I want to quote briefly from another distinguished judge and juror as well as a United States Senator. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read an extract from the report of Senator O'GORMAN made to the Judiciary Committee. It will be remembered that a resolution introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was referred to the Judiciary Committee, the provisions of which directed the committee to inquire into all the branches and phases of this question. In reporting on that resolution to the full committee the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] said:

The contention in favor of the right of the Federal Government to lease the excess water power is without authority or reason to sustain it. Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay (142 U. S., 254), and Green Bay Co. v. Patten (172 U. S., 58), are not in point and do not support the proposition.

He quotes Supreme Court decisions which were relied upon by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to sustain his contention the other day in the discussion of this question before the Senate.

The commerce clause was not involved in either case.

Says the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]—

In the former case the controversy arose between the State and a riparian owner, and in the latter case the right of the Federal Government grew out of a grant and was not based upon the commerce clause.

As I understand the facts in this case, the Government of the United States many years ago donated, perhaps, to the Territory of Wisconsin certain lands to be used for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Fox River. A company was organized to do the work, and the State turned over the land or proceeds finally to this company, conveying to the company all the right the State had and that the riparian owner had in the property. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in his report says:

The claim is made that the Government's improvement creates the excess power, but the fact is that the water that produces the power concededly belongs to the State, and the only effect of the improvement by the Government is to enlarge the potentiality of the State's water at the point of improvement.

The Government has no more right to claim ownership of the increase of the water than the State or a riparian owner would have to require the Government to make compensation for impairment of the stream at other points resulting from the improvement. Where depreciation is necessarily caused by the improvement for navigation the State must bear the loss; where appreciation results from the improvement the State is entitled to the gain. In either case the property affected belongs to the State. As we have seen, the title of the State includes the water as well as the bed of the rivers. The right of the State, under its title, to appropriate the water, subject only to the power of the Government under the commerce clause, is recognized by the cases cited, and the State's title necessarily excludes dominion over its waters by the Government except for the single purpose above indicated. The Government may improve navigation; it can not confiscate the property of the State.

Mr. President, I wish to read very briefly from a report made by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. It will be found on page 96 of the document I hold in my hand.

Says the Senator in his report:

In this connection, and as a further response to the interrogatory, it must be noted that the mere grant by the Federal Government of authority to construct a dam in a navigable river, not for purposes of navigation, but really for the creation of a water power, is merely a license or permit, the effect of which is that if the dam is constructed and operated conformable to plans approved by the Government, it will not be deemed an obstruction or impediment to navigation. And in such case the Government would be authorized to charge a nominal license fee for inspecting and passing upon the plans and for watching over the work to see that it conforms to the plans and is properly maintained; but the regulative power of the Government would not extend to the use of the water for other purposes than navigation and interstate commerce. In such a case it seems to us that the Federal Government has no water power to sell or charge compensation for, for it is only authorized by the Constitution to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, which in this case means navigation.

Further on, Mr. President, I quote from a speech of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to be found on page 19 of the report I hold in my hand. I shall quote only briefly:

The water and the streams of the States belong to and are subject to the control of the States and are not subject to the control of the National Government except in so far as it is necessary to control them in the regulation of commerce.

And again he observes:

The National Government can not, under the guise of regulating commerce, effect objects and purposes not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. Justice Marshall said:

"Should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land."

The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] says further in his report:

Federal expenditures must be reimbursed exclusively through taxation. The function of taxation is to secure sufficient money to perform the delegated governmental functions. This power was limited by section 8, Article I, as follows:

"The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Mr. President, we are opposed to the provisions of this bill because the tax sought to be levied would ultimately fall on the consumer. If water-power companies are required to pay a corporation tax, and they all are—if they are subject to the taxing laws of the State, and the Secretary of War is authorized by the provisions of this bill to add an additional tax or charge at his discretion—all this added burden must necessarily be met by the consumer of power.

It would be a gross discrimination, Mr. President, against other enterprises and power companies. There are many miles of transmission lines conveying power from dams constructed upon nonnavigable streams in various sections of the country. To authorize the levy of a tax upon water power on a navigable river that must come in competition with power generated on nonnavigable rivers would be an unjust and an unequal tax, and ought not to be imposed.

The chief objection to my mind included in the provision which the majority of the committee are endeavoring to eliminate is that it would usurp the authority of the State, and would, in a large measure, take from the State the power it now exercises and controls over corporations and in fact all public-utility companies. If for no other reason, that should be sufficient to satisfy the mind of an ordinary man that this invasion of the right of the State to control its internal affairs should not be permitted.

There can be no question, Mr. President, that the passage of this bill in its original form would bring on conflicts between the States and the Federal Government, the result of which no one can tell. It would to a degree create a twilight zone that can not be navigated, if you will permit the expression, without coming in contact with the breakers that always present themselves on doubtful questions of this character.

Let us see how jealous the governors of certain States in this country are on this particular question.

It will be remembered a few days ago the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House was considering a proposition which gave to the Federal Government control over certain surplus water in a navigable stream in the State of New York. The governor of that State, once a Member of the House and chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, when his attention was called to it, sent a telegram, copy of which I am about to read, to the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill.

I protest against the principle of this bill, asserting ownership on behalf of this State to the water power covered by the bill, and ask that the State be not only permitted to fix the rates by the public-service commission but also be permitted to control the development and distribution of power, subject to Federal control only for purposes of navigation, and urge the committee to give New York State a hearing on the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House unanimously reported that bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not so sure about that. Perhaps it did. I am not talking about the committee; I am talking about the views of the governor of the great State of New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. So that there may be no confusion in the mind of the Senate respecting the matter referred to by the Senator from Ohio, it should be stated that before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House there was not only involved the question as to the power of the Federal Government under the commerce clause, but also the power residing in the Federal Government under the provision of the Constitution permitting the Federal Government to make treaties, that a treaty had been made between the United States and Great Britain respecting the boundary waters between the State of New York and Canada. Everyone conceded, even those asserting the very proper views now urged by the Senator from Alabama, that the rights of the State of New York in the waters of the Niagara River were subject not only to the commerce provision of the Constitution, which allows the Government to intrude only for the purpose of navigation, but that the rights of the State were also subject to the terms of any treaty made between the United States and Great Britain respecting the quantity of water which might be taken out of the Niagara River. But it was asserted, and, if I mistake not, by a majority of the committee, that the right of the State of New York to the waters of the Niagara River on its northern boundary were supreme and exclusive with the exception of the two features to which I have called the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New York.

Again, Mr. President, I desire to quote from a former distinguished Member of this body and at one time governor of the State of Connecticut where this dam is proposed to be built. I refer to ex-Senator Bulkeley. Here is what he said when his attention was called to the provisions of this bill:

What I am opposed to is the sudden claim of the Federal Government that it has anything to say about the Connecticut or any other inland river other than concerns navigation. The Connecticut River, or so much of it as lies within the State, is solely the concern of the State government and not the Federal Government, so far as this improvement is involved. The Federal Government is presenting a brand-new claim after 300 years.

Now, then, in conclusion on this phase of the question, I want to add this: The Senate will find every State in the Union asserting its right to its natural resources in its rivers as the property of the State and its riparian owners, and these contentions on the part of each State will be confined to no particular portion of the country, but will come from the West, the North, the East, and the South whenever the confiscation of the natural resources of any State is attempted, as is attempted now under this bill in the State of Connecticut.

If these so-called new principles are persisted in and Congress ever adopts them, there will be but one conclusion to these conflicts and one settlement of them, and that will be another repeated decision of the Supreme Court deciding that the States own and control their navigable and nonnavigable rivers and that Congress can never by any sort of constitutional legislation in any way control or regulate these natural resources owned by the States.

Mr. President, I believe I have said about all I care to say on this subject. I would not in this discussion refer at all to the so-called Coosa River Dam bill if it were not for the assertions and the direct declarations made in a paper which I hold in my hand. It is headed "For immediate release. Progressive Headquarters, Washington, D. C., February 9, 1913." I will ask the Secretary to read it, because I want it to go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

PROGRESSIVE HEADQUARTERS,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1913.

Information has reached the legislative reference committee of the Progressive Party that certain interests in Congress are scheming to revive the Coosa River Dam bill and pass it over the President's veto. The committee issues the following statement on the general considerations which should govern the disposition of water powers, and contrasting the Coosa River bill with the Connecticut River bill, which is to be voted on by the Senate on February 11:

Efforts are now being made in Congress to revive the indefensible policy of giving away public water powers of enormous and increasing commercial value without safeguards against extortion and without reserving to the people any share in the profits arising from their use. These efforts to betray the public interest are focused in the Coosa River Dam bill, which grants valuable public property to a foreign corporation for nothing and leaves the consumer without appeal to the Government which grants the rights. The issues raised by this bill are of vital and immediate significance. Already over 30,000,000 tons of coal are annually saved by water power, and of present undeveloped water powers the Coosa is one of the most important.

The legislative reference committee of the Progressive Party emphatically condemns the effort to pass the Coosa River Dam bill over the President's veto and asserts that the disposition of public water powers should be controlled by the following principles:

1. Water power belongs to the people. The sites where it is produced should never be permitted to pass out of their hands, for only in this way can effective control be secured.

2. The public has the right to complete information about every business based on the use of public property.

3. Where public development is not desirable the right to use water-power sites should be leased for periods long enough to permit sound and profitable investment, but no longer. At the expiration of each lease all rights should return to the people who gave them.

4. Corporations or individuals who make money out of rights granted by the people should share their profits with the people.

5. The right to regulate the rates and conditions of service of corporations acting under Federal grants should be exercised by the State or local authorities or by national authority when local authorities fail to protect the consumer against extortion.

In contrast with the Coosa River Dam bill, which represents a wrong principle, is the Connecticut River bill, which will be voted upon on February 11. The Connecticut River bill recognizes the right of the Government to control the use of its property by requiring publicity of accounts, participation by the people in profits produced from public property, and reasonable safeguards against the watering of stock. For these reasons the legislative reference committee of the Progressive Party warmly indorses the principle of the Connecticut River bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have asked the Secretary to read that document in order that the Senate might inquire, if it chooses to do so, who this self-constituted committee on progressive legislation is and what their purposes and objects are. I had it read for another reason. This legislative committee of the Progressive Party are undertaking to poke their noses into everything; they are undertaking to make false impressions upon everybody, and everybody knows who a portion of that committee is. One of them I have the honor to know personally, and only one. He acquired fame as a member of a kitchen cabinet that is now bygone. He played tennis in the back yard of the White House, and that is all I know of his doing that could be construed as a public service. I know not why he should come into this controversy. That document is intended for the Associated Press, to be released this morning, and I suppose it has gone to the country. I hope so. It is marked for "immediate release," but a copy fell into my hands and I thought I would obey the instructions and release it by having it read to the Senate.

The reference in this article made by this legislative committee to the Coosa River Dam bill is unwarranted and untruthful, so far as the statement is concerned.

I have said, Mr. President, that I will have no objection to the passage of this Connecticut River bill if the amendment proposed by the majority of the committee shall be adopted. The bill is in substantial conformity to the general dam act. There may be some details that are unnecessary, but they are there and I have no objection to them.

The truth of the business is—and it may as well be stated to the Senate—that these Connecticut River Dam people who came down here to get this permit were taken by the throat, so to speak, and told, "If you do not consent to the provisions that I prescribe, if you do not agree to my policy with reference to this matter, you can have no legislation at all and your bill will be vetoed." Under those circumstances and with that pressure these gentlemen consented, no doubt, that these provisions might be written into the bill. They could perhaps afford to do it. Where this dam is located there is the greatest market, probably, for electrical current in the United States; they can no doubt sell at a profit every horsepower produced. I hope they can; but I want to say to the Senate that if this provision which we are endeavoring to strike out of this bill had been incorporated in the Coosa River bill or in any other bill I should be just as much opposed to it as I am to its insertion in this bill. I am opposed to it on principle, not as a matter of policy.

What has been the effect of the veto by the President of the Coosa River Dam bill? What has been the result? Arrangements had been made and a contract entered into for the construction of a nitrogen plant to take nitrogen from the air by a process recently discovered. It must be remembered that nitrogen is an essential component of high-grade fertilizers; we can not make cotton and corn without it; and I want to admonish Senators from the grain States that the time is very near when they, too, must fertilize their land if they want to keep the production up to the consumption in this country. There was one of the greatest opportunities for conservation of resources ever presented to Congress by means of the construction of a dam and the erection of a nitrogen plant. They would have made the fertilizer, instead of our importing it from Chile, where there is an export duty of $11.16 a ton before it can enter the United States.

What happened? The promoters were compelled to transfer their activities to another country; they were compelled to go to Canada, across the line, near Niagara, where cheap power could be had, and there to-day they are building their plant, which ought to have been constructed in Alabama or in some other State where cheap power could be obtained. That is the result.

Talk about conservation of resources! Such a plant would have saved millions and millions of tons of coal that must necessarily be consumed in the production of power in the absence of this water-power product; millions and millions of cords of wood, thereby conserving our timber resources. That is one result.

We would have conserved all these natural resources—coal, wood, the forests, the land, and the water. As it is now, we are burning our coal by the ton, burning our wood by the cord, importing our fertilizers from Chile, and our water running idly and wastefully to the sea. Is that conservation? That is the kind of conservation that this self-constituted legislative committee would have us enact; that is the kind of conservation they are telling the people of this country must be adopted if our resources are to be conserved.

Mr. President, does conservation mean reservation? Does conservation mean that the natural resources of this country, all of which belong to the people, are to be denied them, are to be tied up indefinitely? Are we to be told, and is this Congress to enact a law that confirms the explanation or the conclusion of these conservationists, that the way to conserve is to reserve and to prevent the development of the resources of this country? How long are they to be tied up? The Coosa River and the Connecticut River are the oldest rivers in the world, perhaps. These resources, these magnificent water powers, have been running idly for years and years to the sea, worth nothing to anybody. Past generations have neglected their opportunities, but the present generation is endeavoring to utilize them, and yet these gentlemen come to Congress and say, "another hundred years must pass before you can intelligently go to work to develop the natural resources of the country." That is what it all means.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate, since I have been compelled to notice the allusions made to the Coosa River, to this item. I remarked a while ago that our nitrates were all imported from Chile; that that country imposed an export tax of $11.16 per ton on them; and that 62 per cent of the entire revenues of that country are derived from its export of this product alone. So important do they regard it, so valuable an asset do they esteem it, that here is what has happened:

[From the Paris edition Daily Mail, Dec. 28, 1912.]

£500,000 PRIZE.

SANTIAGO DE CHILE, Friday.

Senator Bulnes has introduced a bill into the Chilean Senate offering a prize of £500,000 to the inventor of a process which will completely extract the nitrates contained in the raw substance called caliche. (Reuter.)

Caliche was the name given to Chile saltpeter, which occurs as natural deposits in Chile, and which contains from 50 to 75 per cent of sodium nitrate. The nitrates obtained from caliche are used as an artificial manure. The industry is of great importance to Chile.

That little Government, proposing to offer a reward to the inventor who will discover a means by which these nitrates can be completely extracted, put into a marketable form, and sold to those all over the world who from necessity must use it, is willing to pay the enormous sum of $2,500,000 to somebody who will invent a process by which these ingredients can be extracted and made marketable; and here we are, Mr. President, in this great country, surrounded everywhere by this valuable product—nitrogen. It is in the air everywhere; it can not be exhausted; it can only be extracted by means of cheap power—power so cheap that coal and wood can not produce it successfully, power that can only be obtained by the utilization of our water power—and we are told that we can not avail ourselves of this rich asset, that we can not control our own water power, that we can not build dams and locks, provide for navigation, and turn them over to the Government without cost, navigation having been amply provided for, and use the balance of the water, if there is a surplus, introducing this essential article of commerce that must be had if our farms are to be kept up to that state of production where home consumption can be supplied. What kind of conservation do you call it? I have no name for it that I would venture in this presence, Mr. President.

How long are we going to be misled, how long are we going to be deceived, how long are we to have our prejudices played upon by these self-constituted legislative committees, simply thrusting their views upon an innocent public, who have never thought it necessary, perhaps, to give them a serious consideration?

Mr. President, I am now going to yield the floor to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I have said all I care to say on this subject. Others could have said it better, no doubt; but I have endeavored as best I could to present the views of the majority on this important question. I believe, and I think they believe, that the general dam law as it has been worked out and as it is now in operation is entirely sufficient to protect the interests of the Government and to promote the interests of private owners of water power, the State, and the riparian owner, and upon that we are willing to stand.

At the proper time, Mr. President, I shall ask the Senate to vote upon the amendment which I have had read at the desk.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to submit some remarks upon the pending bill; but as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] desires to address the Senate, I shall withhold them until he can be heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Gamble	Page	Sutherland

Mr. WEBB. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], is necessarily absent from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the pending bill concerned only the Connecticut River Co. I would not actively oppose its passage. I might not approve of the principle involved, but I would not actively oppose it. If it were a measure so far local in its consequences as to involve the interests only of the two States which are divided by the Connecticut River and of the other two which are traversed by it, I might not feel warranted in making any active opposition to it.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent here touches Connecticut only when the roll of the States is called. Geographically it is far distant from Connecticut, located in a different section of the Union, and possessing a climate and soil which demand a different domestic policy and a different code of laws. Nevertheless, this bill, as I am compelled to view it, involves an exercise of Federal power which will be invoked in support of other, although perhaps unrelated, legislation applicable to the national domain and to the waters of the natural streams within the State of Colorado.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is therefore in the main correct in saying that there would be no objection to this bill in the Senate except for the opinion of certain Senators that it creates a precedent which might be embarrassing to them. My objections, however, go beyond the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio; they involve the question of the authority of the Government of the United States, acting through Congress, to grant such a privilege as this measure embodies. Indeed, they are fundamental in character, or, perhaps I should say, they are both fundamental and practical, for they affect both the merits of the bill and the jurisdiction of Congress over its subject matter.

It was said by the Senator from Ohio on last Wednesday that the agitation for this improvement—that is, the improvement of navigation in the Connecticut River—assumed active form about 1898, which would be some 15 years ago, but that Congress has refused to make the necessary appropriation for the improvement of the river. I assume, therefore, that the aspect of that agitation was public rather than private, or semi-private, in its nature, and took definite form in an effort to secure an appropriation of funds for the purpose of conducting the work of improving the Connecticut River by the Government directly and under its undoubted authority to control and improve its navigation.

I also assume that if the public demand for this improvement were so insistent, and began so long ago, its urgent and important nature and the exigencies of navigation would long since have resulted in the appropriation of sufficient money for the purpose of perfecting the end desired. I assume this for the reason, chiefly, that the four States which either border upon or are traversed by this river have been at all times well and ably represented in both Houses of the National Legislature. Their Representatives have been at all times fully alive to the interests of their respective constituencies, and anxious for the development of the resources of their several States by perfecting as a commercial highway the navigability of the Connecticut River. It would seem, however, that this urgent situation has not until now crystallized into a definite effort to obtain some sort of legislation by Congress upon the subject. It has now assumed definite form, and the bill under consideration is designed to effectuate the purpose through the medium of the Connecticut River Co.

Yet river and harbor bills for many years have contained items of appropriation covering improvements, some actual and necessary, others not so necessary, and the need for which was perhaps more imaginary than actual, involving enormous amounts of money, frequently arousing a large degree of public disapprobation largely justified by these conditions. If there had been crying demand for this improvement in one of the great rivers of the country traversing a thickly populated region devoted to active manufacturing industry, who doubts that ample provision would have been made for it through the active effort of New England Senators and Representatives?

I assume, therefore, that the proposed improvement, instead of being desired by the people or essential to the improvement of the navigability of the stream for purposes of trade and commerce, is primarily designed to create a water power for the benefit of the grantee in the bill, and that this measure is prompted by the necessity, if this concern would enlarge its business, of making the best possible sort of an agreement with the Government of the United States through a bill of this kind that will enable it to extend and enlarge its equipment so as to meet the demands for power of the present or at least of the future.

It was stated by the Senator from Ohio that the commerce of the river for the year 1912, if I remember correctly, was represented by a traffic of 683,000 tons of the value of $23,000,000, which could be largely increased by the improvements contemplated in this measure; that it would also extend the benefits of river navigation, and I presume therefore, by way of implication, the benefits of competition arising from this extension, to a number of thickly-settled communities lying above the point of obstruction in the stream. The Senator also referred to a line of boats for passengers plying between Hartford and New York whose business would be favorably affected by the improvement.

But this want was doubtless as insistent, relatively at least, between 1898 and the present time as it is to-day. Yet for some reason, not up to this time disclosed, the Government of the United States has not, in its governmental capacity, seen fit or has not been urged to make the improvement on its own account. This is a subject of proper comment, in view of the sudden urgency which the situation has assumed and which may be due to other motives than that of river navigation.

It might be pertinent, therefore, to inquire what particular agency, if any, transacted this business upon the river and transported so many passengers and so many tons of merchandise upon its waters. We know, the whole country knows, that the transportation business of the New England States is under the control and domination of a single great company, which has extended its powers and dominion over the great domain of transportation so completely that there no longer exists such a thing as opposition to the monopoly which it enjoys. Has this company had something to do with the retardation of the improvement of this river? Its monopoly in transportation justifies the inquiry as to the good faith of the insistence that the purpose of the bill is to improve the navigation of the river; that it is urgently demanded by the people; and the further inquiry whether, if so improved, the improvement will benefit, if it benefits anyone, any other than the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. This suggests the further query whether the benefit to that corporation will consist of the added miles of navigation to the stream or the added capacity of the Connecticut River to generate electric current for its use.

The Connecticut River Co. was chartered by the State of Connecticut in 1824, nearly 100 years ago, "for the purpose of improving the boat navigation of the Connecticut River." If we may judge by what has been said about it, the company was not incorporated for any other purpose. Its original grant of powers may have been sufficiently great to embrace other subjects and other operations; but in the absence of further information we must assume that its original and perhaps its only purpose was the improvement of boat navigation upon the Connecticut River. Its charter may have since been amended.

But recently another power company has competed with it for what the Senator from Ohio has called the "franchise" involved in the body of this bill; and being at odds, nothing was attempted here until they either united their forces or the other quit the field. "Being at odds," says the Senator from Ohio, "it was useless to grant a franchise to either."

This expression of the Senator conveys to my mind the notion that the primary, the real, purpose of this bill is to grant a franchise—which, of course, is a privilege, the value depending very largely upon the subject matter—to a private corporation organized under the laws of the State of Connecticut under the guise of improving navigation. The notion that it is a franchise is also borne out by the recital on page 6, line 6, of the bill itself, which refers to—

> The value of the authority hereby granted.

We have a right to assume, I think, that up to this time the franchises of this company, whatever they may have been, were conferred upon it by State and not by Federal legislation or action. It was said that it has had authority to and has been generating electric current for some time since 1909, and this, of course, must have been by State authority to manufacture and market it.

This leads up to the proposition that the bill in its simplest terms relates to a power scheme already established, and seeks through the agency of Federal authority to extend itself by the increase of its water power. In other words, the main purpose of the bill is to increase the energy of the stream for private purposes through the operation of the power of the Government to regulate commerce among the States.

The ostensible purpose of the bill, and of kindred measures, is to prevent monopoly. The Senator from Ohio so said, and he certainly believes that such will be the effect of the bill. It is no possible reflection upon his good faith and integrity of purpose to assert that instead of preventing, this bill will promote or continue a tendency to monopoly in water power that has been in operation in this country for a long time.

I take it that the Senator's support of this bill is entirely due to his belief that it will tend to prevent a monopoly in water power by the exercise of a sort of governmental control, to some extent at least, over the property and the power and the methods of the company.

The Senator said:

Mr. President and Senators, I maintain that a condition of that kind is absolutely necessary to prevent monopoly in this very valuable asset of the Nation. Already there has been a very considerable degree of consolidation. The head of the Bureau of Corporations made a report some time since, in which he showed this tendency to concentration in the hands of a limited number of corporations, and that under this tendency a very large share of the water power of the country was falling under the control of certain corporations which have been alert and active in seeking to gain for themselves this very valuable privilege.

In this connection let me refer to this statement of the Senator a little later on:

Those who are seeking it—

That is, this privilege—

are willing, and indeed anxious, to accept on the terms proposed.

This therefore is the situation: The Government upon one hand, under the provisions of this bill, proposes to limit, if not to prevent, the creation of a monopoly in water power, while the company which is to be benefited and also to be injuriously affected by this measure, so far as it corrects any tendency to combination, is not only willing but anxious to accept the grant upon the terms proposed.

These considerations bring me to my first objection to the bill, Mr. President, which is that the bill instead of preventing serves to enhance a monopoly now existing. Therefore in my judgment it can not carry out the purposes for which it seems, at least in part, to have been designed.

I assert that there is a monopoly of water power in this country already, as shown by the report of the Bureau of Corporations, to which the Senator referred. It is of far-reaching dimensions. It is in the control of a few hands. It is enormously overcapitalized. It is imposing prices for power out of all proportion to the capital actually invested in it. I am making at present no particular comment upon this condition. I am merely stating a well-known fact—a fact to which we can not shut our eyes; a fact that is becoming more and more prominent as time passes. Whether it is caused by the natural laws of commercial evolution, by conspiracy in restraint of trade, by lack of State control, or as a result of the indifference or imbecility or corruption of the governing powers, or by all these causes combined, is not material here. It is not only a menace of the future, but it is a condition of the present.

Its correction must come, if at all, from other sources than legislation of the kind here proposed.

I may say in passing that my own view of the subject is that the generation and use of electric current constitutes a natural monopoly in which there can be no real permanent competition; and as a consequence the business should be subject not only to governmental control but to governmental operation, if not governmental ownership, if that should prove essential to its control. The important bearing of the existence of this condition upon the measure now under consideration is that much of this monopoly's most valuable assets have been acquired through the enactment by Congress of measures like this. That value, in so far as congressional action is concerned, consists not alone in the intrinsic worth of the water power secured, but in its probable exemption from State taxation, State regulation, and State control, because it is stamped with the impress of Federal ownership.

In defending the proposition that Congress may, as an incident to the control of navigation, confer upon a private corporation a franchise like this, the Senator from Ohio referred to preceding legislation of a similar character, and cited a list, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 2802 and 2803, of acts heretofore passed by the Congress of the United States relating to the same subject—that is to say, to the "grant," if I may so term it, by Congress to private corporations of rights in water power.

These several acts of Congress begin with one dated the 11th day of August, 1888, and end with one bearing date the 2d day of March, 1907. A significant circumstance attaching to this list is that the exercise of this power to grant franchises in water power is of recent exercise, and, therefore, I may say, of recent origin. Another significant circumstance connected with it, Mr. President, is that these grants began coincidently with the rise in the commercial world of electric power as an agency of commerce and of industry.

It would seem as though, contemporaneously with the realization of the enormous value of electric current in the commercial world as an agency of business and of industry and of civilization in all its various phases, the eyes of business foresight and sagacity were turned upon Congress, or upon the Federal power as a possible agency through the medium of which these enormously valuable concessions could be obtained, and, being obtained from Federal authority, might be the more valuable by reason of their possible exemption in consequence from State or local control.

The exercise of an authority that is born with the sudden origin of a demand by means of which a new departure is made in exercising, or at least a novel construction is placed upon a power already ample, in its manifold development throughout the history of the country, shows to my mind that instead of being the exercise primarily of a control over navigation, it is a pretended exercise of that power for the real purpose of producing some other result and reaching some other end. This bill, for example, instead of being designed to benefit navigation, is designed, through the power of Congress, to so exercise that authority as to create and confer valuable rights and franchises upon certain industrial activities of the country. Thus a sovereign attribute of the Federal Government seems to have been transformed, or is being transformed, into a commercial asset for the benefit of great private interests.

We have heard a good deal during the past few years about "dollar diplomacy." Whether founded upon a proper basis or not, it is the popular impression, which I think well justified, that the diplomatic powers and agencies of the Government of the United States have in recent years been diverted into currents of commercialism, and that in our negotiations with and our relations to other countries the opening up of new and attractive avenues for investment by capital upon a large scale has been the dominating thought and the dominating motive of our diplomatic policies. "Dollar diplomacy" has, therefore, become a popular expression, defining conditions which, in my judgment, largely justify its use. Our activities in this direction have become so insistent in recent times that occasions have arisen making it necessary to reenforce them with the presence of battleships in the Caribbean and the establishment of receiverships in Santo Domingo.

We are now supplementing "dollar diplomacy" through the enactment of measures like this, and creating, through their agency, what may be termed a "dollar sovereignty," which goes hand in hand with our "dollar diplomacy." They are the Gold Dust Twins of our new nationalism, born of the alliance between high finance and the national authority. If it be true that through this species of legislation we are virtually creating private interests through the guise of exercising a sovereign power for a great public purpose, then it is equally true that the fact should appear, and should appear as its most prominent feature, to the end that its true nature and character may be fully understood and estimated by the people of this country.

So far as the legislation of Congress is concerned, although I may be mistaken, nevertheless I think I am safe in asserting that prior to the time when, through the development and discoveries of science, electric energy became the great moving force in our industrial civilization, it never occurred to any legislator or to any lawyer, constitutional or otherwise, that the power to control navigation under the commerce clause of the Constitution could be made an agency for the creation of property belonging to the Government as its creator, which in turn could be made the subject of a grant for the benefit of private parties.

The Green Bay cases, to which frequent reference has been recently made, are cases which I have read with much care since the beginning of this argument. In my judgment the opinions therein are entirely susceptible of the construction which was placed upon them by the Senator from Ohio, and they support as well the construction which is insisted upon by the Senator from New York. But they grew out of and were based upon an act of Congress of 1846, whereby certain lands were conveyed to the State of Wisconsin, the proceeds of which were to be utilized for the improvement of navigation in the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. The State for some reason found itself unable to perform the trust imposed upon it by this act of Congress, and therefore contracted with a private corporation to make the desired improvement. That company was also unable to carry out the object of its creation, in consequence of which all its rights, whatever they were, fell into the hands of the Green Bay Co. through processes of law. That company, falling also into financial straits, conveyed or granted to the Government of the United States all of its property and improvements in the rivers, with the exception of the power or the right to use the force generated by the stream, together with its power plant. In other words, it reserved its riparian rights from the operation of the grant.

Hence the real question here involved—although it seems to have been discussed and to some degree decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in these cases—was evidently injected into the record without reference at all to the commerce clause of the Constitution or to the powers of Congress thereunder. If the right of the Government to acquire property, and to grant a franchise in waters of a flowing stream navigable in character under the commerce clause had been directly presented in those cases, I think it is safe to say that a different or more modified conclusion would have been reached by the court.

I am not aware of any other cases in which it is claimed that the direct point has been involved or was judicially disposed of, and inasmuch as there is such a wide discrepancy of opinion between good lawyers in this body as to the meaning and effect of these decisions it is pertinent at least to insist that the question is still an open one, in so far as the courts of the country are concerned.

Referring once more to the list of acts of Congress which are cited as precedents for the one now under consideration, and assuming that they also were designed or intended or believed by their advocates to have been intended to prevent a monopoly in water power, it is somewhat remarkable to find that, with one exception, none of them place any restrictions whatever, in so far as a tax or toll may be said to be a restriction, upon the exercise of the powers therein conferred upon the grantee. True, they all invest the Secretary of War with almost unlimited authority in making leases to impose conditions which he may or may not exercise. They confer wide discretion, but they do not fix any restriction whatever upon the exercise of this authority, and none upon the enjoyment of the property right, unless the Secretary of War sees fit to impose them.

One of them, that relating to Lock No. 4, at Coosa, Ala., does provide that, beginning with 1925, 12 years from now and 14 years after its enactment, the grantee shall pay to the United States $1 per annum per horsepower, with an increase if the normal flowage is increased by storage reservoirs.

I am entirely at a loss, Mr. President, to comprehend how the mere investiture of an administrative officer with a discretionary power of control over the operation of a franchise granted to a corporation can amount in any degree to a restriction or limitation upon the power and authority of the grantee of that franchise, except in so far as some particular feature may call into active exercise the authority of that officer. This certainly appears to me to be a most inefficient method either of preventing a combination of the several grantees among themselves or with others or in any manner affecting their relations to the public or to the private consumer.

This brings me to a short consideration of the bill under discussion. I contend that there is nothing in any of its recitals which in the slightest degree restricts or limits the powers or the rights of the grantee in the bill, except in so far as the discretion of the Secretary of War may be said to be such a restriction. Instead of preventing, therefore, I insist that it actually promotes the possibility of a combination by clothing the grantee of the franchise with full power and authority to act as its interests or inclinations may afterwards prompt it to do, subject only to those easy limitations which may readily be complied with or avoided. Let us see what the alleged controlling and restricting provisions are:

And provided further, That the rights and privileges hereby granted may be assigned with the written authorization of the Secretary of War, or in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, but not otherwise.

"The rights and privileges hereby granted" may be assigned either by "the written authorization of the Secretary of War, or in pursuance of the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction." Either of these may be easily obtained whenever the conditions calling for the exercise of the power are favorable to or desired by the company.

Now, we know from our experiences at the bar that judgments of this sort, especially when they are sought by both parties to the transaction, or where there is no opposition to the application, are perfectly easy of obtainment. There be courts and courts.

This right of assignment by judgment is limited, Mr. President, to the action of no particular court. Any "court of competent jurisdiction" may grant the right. How then can it be said that if there arises an exigency or an occasion for assignment which appeals to the interests of the company and those who control it, the authority to sell and dispose of the franchise can not be easily obtained?

I do not, in speaking thus, reflect upon the courts; at least I do not intend to do so. I merely state what seems to me to be an apparent truth, that the condition or limitation imposed upon assignment by this measure is practically no condition or limitation at all, but that when the exigency or the occasion arises, an appeal to the Secretary of War or to the courts will be followed beyond a doubt by granting the required permission.

There is and can be nothing in this measure which in any manner interferes or which can interfere with or be a limitation upon the transfer of a controlling interest in this concern by an assignment of its shares of stock to any other corporation or any other individual or individuals.

There are many ways of creating a combination, of which perhaps a holding company is the most familiar and most popular at the present time. By the simple assignment of a majority of the shares of its stock to any concern desirous of securing them, the holding company or some other, there is just as complete an assignment, and therefore as much monopoly followed by as great a degree of benefit or injury to the patrons or consumers of this concern as though there had been an assignment of the franchise itself under a decree of court or by the written authorization of the Secretary of War.

Instead, therefore, of placing a limitation upon the power to create monopoly, the bill merely provides one method whereby it may be accomplished, leaving all others open to the company to avail itself of them if it should care to do so.

Another provision in the bill which is said to "prevent monopoly" is:

That the Secretary of War, as a part of the conditions and stipulations referred to in said act, may, in his discretion, impose a reasonable annual charge or return, to be paid by the said corporation or its assigns to the United States, the proceeds thereof to be used for the development of navigation on the Connecticut River and the waters connected therewith.

It can not be pretended that this proviso imposes upon the Secretary of War a duty to impose a reasonable or any annual charge upon the corporation. It simply invests him with the power to impose such a charge or not, as he may see fit. It delegates to him, in other words, a quasi judicial power, an authority entirely permissive in its character to do what he pleases, and which he may exercise or decline to exercise as the appeals of the company or as his own information or inclination, or both, may ultimately determine.

There is this limitation, however, that—

In fixing such charge, if any, the Secretary of War shall take into consideration the existing rights and property of said corporation and the amounts spent and required to be spent by it in improving the navigation of said river, and no charge shall be imposed which shall be such as to deprive the said corporation of a reasonable return on the fair value of such dam and appurtenant works and property, allowing for the cost of construction, maintenance and renewal, and for depreciation charges.

To my mind that means nothing whatever. It simply provides that before the Secretary of War can fix any charge at all upon the operation of the company's affairs he must take into consideration these various expenditures, and having taken them into consideration they may be so large in their amount, when contrasted with the volume of the company's business, as to discourage him from imposing any charge at all.

Now, apart from the unwisdom, in my judgment, of investing a single administrative officer with this large discretion, apart from the dangers which, I think, are involved in the attempted exercise of such a power, when it is considered that once exercised it does not remain a fixed quantity, but may be withdrawn or changed or diminished or enlarged, it becomes a disturbing factor in the operations of the grantee's business. In effect the Government says to the Secretary: "You may do what you please in the matter of imposing annual charges upon the company; you may regulate the amount which it shall pay into the Treasury of the United States from its earnings; you may decline to exercise the authority if you see fit; or, having exercised it, you may continue to do so from time to time by enlarging or diminishing or removing the charge as you shall deem proper."

This is a loose method of arranging for or providing restrictions against a danger the menace of which is urged as the prime reason for the enactment of an important measure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What protection does the mere supervision of the Federal power give to the ultimate consumers of this power?

Mr. THOMAS. None whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It gives no power further than to tax.

Mr. THOMAS. That is a power which may or may not be exercised. It depends entirely upon the point of view of the man who happens to be Secretary of War on any given occasion.

It is significant, also, that this is the feature of every act included in the list prepared by the Senator from Ohio, with a single exception, which does not take effect until 1925.

I may say to the Senator from Arizona that this provision does not give any protection to the consumer, because the charge imposed may be added to the amount which he must pay for power, and thus the burden of the Government charge is shifted from the corporation to the customer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Colorado says that it may be shifted to the consumer. It would almost inevitably be shifted to the consumer, would it not?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so.

Mr. BORAH. Even if we were not fixing the rate, if some other tribunal was fixing the rate, and this burden was placed on this power, they would be able to shift it to the consumer.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it follows inevitably that such would be the method.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if that would not be true in case the State levied a tax on it to the same extent. A tax by the State or any charge applied by the State would be just as proper to be taken into consideration in estimating what charges for power would be reasonable as a tax or charge levied by the Federal Government. So the effect of the point made by the Senator and others who take that view is that there should not be levied any charge or any tax.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if a tax was levied either by the State or by the Federal Government, in my judgment, the consumer would ultimately pay it. For that reason I believe in erecting a tribunal which will fix a tax for the protection of the consumer and not for the purpose of obtaining some money with which to build up a great department to dredge rivers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not believe that because the National instead of the State authority imposes a burden by way of a tax upon the corporation it would make any difference in its effect upon the consumer. The natural tendency, perhaps the inevitable practice, is that all these extra charges are carried along and the consumer ultimately bears them. That is almost a self-evident consequence. It might not perhaps be an objection to the imposition of the tax, but I refer to the subject because it is urged here by the advocates of this bill as a protection to the consumer, as a protection to the public, and above all as a prevention of monopoly. Now, that it can operate in either of those directions seems to me to be impossible in view of these considerations.

Hence I come back to the proposition stated a few moments ago, that my fundamental objection to this bill is that its paramount object and the object of all kindred measures is not to improve navigation but to utilize the Government's sovereign power to control navigation merely as an agency in behalf of a private enterprise, to create a property to be claimed by the Government and by it donated to private parties, or conveyed to them under conditions which make it virtually a donation. I do not think the Government of the United States, even if it had the authority to do so, should go upon the streams of the country and under the pretense of improving navigation become virtually an agency of private concerns to invest them, first, with a property which the Government does not possess and then with a franchise which exempts them from State control.

The Constitution never designed the investiture of the Federal Government with this far-reaching power for any such purpose. In all the writings of commentators upon that great document nothing can be found, so far as my investigation goes, which lends countenance to the use of so great an attribute of sovereignty for so ignoble a purpose. It is the utilization of a sovereign attribute of the Federal Government in other words, for commercial purposes and private interests.

There can be no doubt in my mind, after an examination of these bills, and the Connecticut River bill is one of them, that the alleged improvement of the river is wholly secondary and subordinate to the creation of a physical condition in the stream which will add to the assets and the wealth of the Connecticut River Co., and that, too, by investing it with an asset which does not belong to the Government of the United States and over which it has and should have no control except in so far as is necessary and incidental to the purpose and for the power can be lawfully exerted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the asset which the Government of the United States confers upon the licensee in this case?

Mr. THOMAS. I am going to come to that very soon. I may say to the Senator from Connecticut, however, it is the energy created in the stream by the improvements made in it and which is to be used to generate an article of commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say a word——

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is conferred by the franchise this company has held from the State of Connecticut since the year 1824.

Mr. THOMAS. That being the case, why is the company here ready and anxious to obtain this franchise, as it is called by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Ohio may have named it that, and the Senator from Colorado has been quick to seize upon that term, but I do not agree that it is a franchise. The consent of Congress is given for this company to relocate an existing dam practically in the same place where it has been in existence for 80 years. It is moved a short distance from its present site, where it gets a better location, and where a larger lock in the interest of navigation can be maintained than at the present point. When the company can not place any obstruction in a navigable river without the consent of Congress, and has come here to get it with such limitations as Congress may impose, how that can be properly described as conferring property in the waters of a stream within the State and conferring a valuable franchise I can not see.

The clause the Senator from Ohio quoted on page 6, where the words "value of the authority hereby granted" appear, is a clause which prevents acquiring any property by the issuing of this permit, because it occurs in connection with the scheme for the assessing of whatever property the company may have, if the Government does not renew the license after 50 years, and provides distinctly that "the value of the authority hereby granted" shall not be taken into consideration in estimating what shall be paid to the company.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am unable to see that the Connecticut River Co. is ready to make this improvement because inspired by a philanthropic desire to improve navigation in the Connecticut River, nor that it is anxious to reconstruct its dam and, in addition thereto, to build a lock of great value and present it to the Government of the United States, unless it is going to get something valuable in return. I am not very particular as to what that thing which it gets may be called, for designations amount, after all, to comparatively little in a matter of this sort.

What we are concerned with is that this is a contract between the Government of the United States as party of the first part and the Connecticut River Co. as party of the second part, in which each undertakes to do certain things. The benefit, whatever it may be called, which is conferred upon the company is the result of the improvements which it is permitted to make and which is so valuable that the Senator from Ohio says these conditions are required in the bill to prevent the creation of a monopoly by its bestowal. That monopoly, if there is danger of the creation of one, must find for its basis the thing, whatever it is, which springs into existence as the result of the performance of this contract.

If the Government has nothing to convey, then certainly it can exercise no control or authority over this company in so far as its revenues are concerned. If the Government is not conferring an asset upon it, how can it tax the company upon the assumption that it has given it a right and power and property not enjoyed in common with others, from which others are excluded, and which depends for its existence upon the performance of the things required in the bill from the company?

When interrupted I was calling the attention of the Senate to the real purpose of the bill, and I was stating that to accomplish it we were proposing to utilize a sovereign authority of the Government for the benefit of the party of the second part to this contract. The Senator from Ohio before concluding his speech made a statement which, I think, supports my present contention. He said:

> While I was connected with the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the other House I knew of cases where the building of locks and dams was advocated under the guise of improving navigation, when the real object, after the dam had been constructed, was to obtain water power.

That is the thing which is being accomplished here, the real object being to obtain a water power, not to improve the navigation of the river except in so far as that results as a consequence from the thing to be done, and except in so far as it is necessary, in order to secure the doing of the thing, to base and pivot it upon the assumption that the primary purpose of the measure is to improve navigation.

I have no doubt in the river and harbor bill which this body will soon be called upon to consider there will appear many items—which the Senator from Ohio will readily recognize when his attention is called to them—in which the object is not to improve navigation at all, but to obtain water power at public expense. These matters, Mr. President, are prompted and encouraged by the introduction and attempted passage of bills like this. The time will come, and perhaps it will come shortly, when the Government may throw off all pretense of improving navigation and devote itself to the enactment of these measures, utilizing the river and harbor bill chiefly for the creation of water power, not perhaps for the purpose of conferring it upon individuals or corporations, but to acquire what the protest which was read here a few moments ago by the Senator from Alabama calls public water powers, or water powers belonging to the public. Just what is meant by that expression I confess I do not fully understand, for I know of no such thing as a public water power in the sense that such a power belongs to the General Government or to the States, unless the one or the other has created it for some public purpose appurtenant to the particular government acquiring it.

These conditions, Mr. President, provoke raids upon the Treasury, and bill after bill will be introduced, and doubtless have been introduced, for the purpose that is sought to be, and will be, accomplished by this measure if it becomes a law.

Another objection I have to the measure is that the Federal Government, having no property interest in the subject matter of the grant, is without authority to enact the law.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. Before the Senator passes to the other objection, I should like to ask if he would be willing to give us his opinion as to how he would circumvent this impending monopoly of water power? Do I understand him to say that he thinks such corporations should be under State ownership and State control?

Mr. THOMAS. My own belief as to this and kindred matters, Mr. President, is that no public utility whatever should be committed to the keeping of private individuals. I believe that this, being a natural monopoly, should be under the control, if not the ownership, of the respective States where the power plants are located. I will go further and say that if the States should prove to be unable to control the monopoly, and it should appear that the power of control can only be found in the Government of the United States, then measures should be taken, if necessary, by an amendment to the Constitution, whereby the American people in their sovereign capacity should take charge of and control them; and, if necessary to such control, ownership appears to be essential, then such ownership should follow on the general proposition that the welfare and the necessities of the public and of the individual should be the supreme consideration of the national authority.

Mr. McLEAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that he would include with the water power the public charge of all public utilities?

Mr. THOMAS. If necessary; yes.

Mr. McLEAN. By condemnation?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Connecticut asks me for my opinion, and of course I can not express an opinion as to how, in my judgment, a particular public utility that is a natural monopoly can be controlled without extending that view to all similar conditions.

Mr. McLEAN. Whether it be a water power upon a navigable or a nonnavigable river?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McLEAN. And you would recommend as the only solution for this dilemma in which we are put by these impending monopolies a condemnation by the State if necessary?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. And State ownership and control?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. The General Electric Co. and its various constituencies, according to the official record or report of the Bureau of Corporations, practically dominate the electric energy of the Nation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to get the opinion of the Senator from Colorado as to whether or not a State or a number of States could effectively regulate such a monopoly as that where the power plant is located in one State and the power is conveyed into other States.

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely. The mere fact that some part of the current created is utilized in another State does not in anywise affect the power of a State over the corporation owning the property and subject to its jurisdiction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The levy of a tax by a State upon the sale of the power undoubtedly would be claimed by the company resisting it to be an attempt on the part of the State to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not necessary to accomplish the end by placing a tax upon the property.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that I have introduced an amendment to this bill providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix the price of all power transferred from one State to another.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that that is a good amendment. It is a principle for which we are contending.

Mr. BORAH. My idea was that we ought to begin to take into consideration after awhile the men who are going to consume this power—the people who are going to burn the electric lights and otherwise use electricity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I think we ought to take them into consideration; but the trouble is that a great many of those who are seeking to get franchises or grants of this kind are unwilling to take the consumers into consideration or to have any such conditions attached to their bills as the one which was just now suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. They ask for a grant and insist upon an unconditional grant.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at some other time I shall be more than willing to enter into a discussion or a statement of whatever views I may entertain as an individual upon the most interesting subject of regulating monopolies. I do not, however, conceive it to be entirely germane to the objections which I am attempting specifically to state against the measure now under consideration.

I said a few moments ago that another objection which I had to this measure was that the Federal Government, having no property interest in the subject matter of the grant, is without authority to make it. The subject matter, by whatever name it may be called, is a right to a supply of water power for the generation of electric current. What the subject matter is called is largely immaterial; the thing itself is the important consideration.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] the other day said that there could be no property in running water; that it was as free as air; and he likened its condition in law to that of a flying bird, which, until reduced to physical possession, was the property of no man. Now, these abstract propositions we may concede, but if the Government is not as a subject matter conferring upon the company the right to generate electricity from water power to which it asserts ownership, then it is selling nothing at all.

The Senator from Nevada said that what were really the subjects of the grant were the structures placed in the river which made this increased current possible; but a moment's reflection, I think, will show the fallacy of that position, for the structures in the river are not placed there by the Government at all. They are constructed by the company which gives or presents the lock to the Government, retaining its title to the dam. It is the dam which creates the current, and not the locks. If that view of the situation be correct, then, certainly the Government is without power to exact from the grantee here a direct tax upon its own structure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Colorado will admit that that structure can alone be put there by the National Government or by its agent in so far as the structure itself is in aid of navigation.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I may concede that for the sake of the argument, but the conclusion announced by the Senator from Nevada does not follow at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, let me add one word further, that the company is simply the agent of the Government in erecting in this stream a structure in aid of navigation; and my argument was that if this structure created a head of water which through the use of the structure could be made valuable, the Government could utilize that head of water; and if the Government could utilize it, its agent, this power company, could utilize it.

Mr. THOMAS. An agent, Mr. President, must have a principal, and certainly the Senator from Nevada will not, upon reflection, contend that an agent who pays the cost of the entire transaction, instead of the principal, is the kind of an agent that is contemplated by the legal use of the term. I do not think there is any agency about it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, my assumption is that the Nation has the right as sovereign under the commerce power of the Constitution to erect this structure——

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That no individual can put up this structure without its consent, and that the Government can act either directly or through an agent in the exercise of the commerce power; directly it can put up this structure, or it can act indirectly through an agent, and the terms upon which that agent is to be permitted to put up that structure are simply a matter of contract and agreement between the principal, the sovereign, and the agent thus authorized.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator from Nevada claim that an agreement may be made between the Federal Government and an agent, whereby the property of a State may be taken without the consent of the State?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator from Nevada claim that the Federal Government has any right, under the commerce clause, to do more than to enter the stream for the single, naked purpose of promoting its navigation, and that when it performs that purpose it exhausts every power granted to the Federal Government under the Constitution—that the right to go into a stream for the purpose of promoting its navigation can not be construed into a grant of property rights in the possession of the State? The stream belongs to the State before the Federal Government enters it for the purpose of exercising this naked right, and the stream continues the property of the State even after the Federal Government exercises this right. The right exercised by the Federal Government is akin to a limited agency conferred by a principal upon an agent to do a specific thing, and it can not be extended or enlarged, as I understand the Senator from Nevada is disposed to enlarge this power.

Much of the discussion here to-day and previously relates to a question of policy and ignores the vital proposition that under this bill recognition is proposed to be given to a principle which would be destructive of the rights reserved to the States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is not necessary, in order to answer the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], to enter into all the refinements which he has considered with reference to the rights of the States and the rights of the Nation. Every man will admit that the Nation has a right in aid of navigation to construct the structure which is authorized by this bill. If the Nation constructed it, it would be the owner of it; and, being the owner of it, it could put that structure to any beneficial use it chose.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Whether provided for by the Constitution or not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It could put it to any beneficial use it chose—that is my contention—because it is the owner of the structure, and every right of ownership attaches to it as the owner of the structure. In this case the agent is designated by the National Government to put up that structure. The agent would have the same right as the Government itself in that structure if those rights are secured by the contract with the National Government. It is a matter simply of contract between the National Government and the agent regarding the construction and regarding the use of a structure which the National Government has the right to create or which it can authorize an agent to create. That is my contention. That structure in that stream creates a certain head of water which can be used beneficially either by the Government or by the agent, and the use of that head of water created by the structure which no one else can erect does not invade any right of the State in the stream.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator is logical, and his conclusion is consistent with his premise, but the fundamental difference between us is evolved at the threshold of his statement. If it be true that the Government, after constructing a dam of its own for the improvement of navigation, can use it for any purpose it pleases consistent with navigation, then it is equally true that if it authorizes me to build a dam I can use it for every purpose consistent with its original purpose of the improvement of navigation. But the Government's power, Mr. President, is measured and limited by the purpose contemplated in the commerce clause of the Constitution. To say that it can be extended further in one direction is to concede that it can be extended further in any direction; and when that is given due consideration the consequences, it seems to me, conclude the existence of the authority.

Now, proceeding with the discussion, I maintain that the grant here proposed to be made by Congress to the Connecticut River Co. must consist of property or property rights, or both, belonging to or under the exclusive proprietary control of the Federal Government or it can not be made at all.

I contend, further, that the Federal Government can not, through the exercise of the sovereign Federal authority or power to regulate or improve a navigable stream, acquire interests or rights to its waters as the owner or proprietor thereof which may be used or conveyed or sold or leased to others for purposes wholly foreign to navigation. It is a fundamental proposition that you can not lease or sell or dispose of property unless you own it or have some interest in it which is the subject of a transfer; and I do not perceive any difference—certainly there is no essential difference—between the proprietary powers of the Government of the United States in that regard and those of an individual.

This proposition, apart from its self-evident truth, to my mind was ultimately conceded by the Senator from Ohio before he took his seat and concluded his discussion. On page 2815 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD he is reported to have made this statement:

> First, that whenever an improvement is made which promotes navigation and in such improvement, whether by locks or dams or otherwise, a water power is created—

Which, of course, means that it did not before exist; which means that it was brought into existence by virtue of the improvement—> that water power is an incident to the principal fact, and it belongs to the State or Government which seeks to promote navigation.

Hence, unless it can be said that this power so created does belong to the Government, its authority, acting through Congress, to enact this measure falls to the ground. We therefore are at one with reference to the fundamental condition underlying the exercise of this power. I might paraphrase the expression of the Senator from Ohio by stating the proposition thus: Wherever an improvement is made which promotes navigation, but which improvement is primarily designed to develop water power and to promote navigation merely as an incident to the principal fact, such water power does not belong nor become subject to the control of the Government either in its proprietary or sovereign capacity.

In the document entitled "Federal Control of Water Power," printed for the use of the Committee on Commerce, is a legal opinion by Hon. Rome G. Brown which discusses this general proposition so thoroughly and exhaustively as to make any addition to it practically impossible. On page 274 of that pamphlet he says:

> 1. The only power of control belonging to the Federal Government is under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to regulate navigable streams as highways—that is, for the purpose of navigation—and this power excludes every proprietary element and is purely a limited sovereign power of control for a specific purpose.

Again, on page 246, he says:

> Conservation—the reserving of that which one has—is legal and proper, but the attempted appropriation of any beneficial use or the proceeds or advantage thereof from another which has passed to the latter in private ownership is not conservation; it is confiscation.

These expressions seem to me to embody a correct statement of the very important principle which is here involved, and, if they be correct, then I deny that the Government in its sovereign or any other capacity can, through the exercise of some authority conferred upon it for a wholly different purpose, carve a property right out of that which belongs under the laws of the country to some one else, the State or an individual, or both, and make it a subject of barter and sale; yet that is precisely what this bill assumes to do, and the fact that so many of these measures have already been enacted indicates how eager those exploiting these powers are to secure them through the agency of the Government of the United States under its exercise of the power conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution.

It is said, Mr. President, and earnestly contended in fact, that those of us opposing this bill do so because of our ultra and extreme regard for the rights of the States. That is no doubt true to a very great extent. I believe as firmly as any Member of this body can believe in the preservation of the rights of the States, whatever those rights may be, but I do not have now and never had had, although affiliating all my life with the Democratic Party, any superstitious reverence for what in general terms is denominated "State rights."

My reading of history teaches me that the general principle has been advocated and repudiated by every political party in existence since the adoption of the Constitution, as the particular emergency or exigency seemed to demand, and, if I read history aright, I am also convinced that a power supposed to belong to the States absolutely to-day may be conceded to be one pertaining to the Federal Government to-morrow, and that some rights originally possessed exclusively by the States relate to subjects which have been affected by conditions expanding them into an area sufficiently large to justify their supervision and control by the National Government. I believe firmly with Mr. Bryan that there is no such thing as a twilight zone between the limitations and boundaries of national and State authority, but that both of them together cover—and cover completely—all powers of government which should exist, and which are, in fact, possessed by every country, whatever its form of government may be, which is sovereign in its character and in its capacity.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that this is not a question of State rights, so much as it is a question of State property, or property of individuals who are citizens of the State, and of which the Federal power assumes the right to dispose; it is not so much a question as to whether some authority is being taken from the States, over which the States have exclusive control, as it is whether the General Government can engage in a deliberate seizure of a property right which belongs to the State in its proprietary capacity, or which belongs to the individuals owning the property bordering on the streams, or both. Hence, State reservations and State powers are only incidentally concerned in this discussion, if I properly understand it. They are concerned to this extent: If the Government can confer a right or a franchise like this upon the Connecticut River Co., that company may claim an exemption from State laws concerning taxation as to that property, whether it be a franchise or whether it be an asset in the strict sense of the term. Because it is a subject of franchise, Federal limitations are placed upon it; and the company could well, and I think successfully, appeal to the Federal courts to protect it against any attempt on the part of the State government to bring it within the jurisdiction of its revenue laws.

Consequently, in one respect at least, there is an element which makes the question of the rights of the States important. But if the State of Connecticut is the owner of this increased power, or if the company, which I suppose has long been a riparian owner, is entitled to this power, then the Government has no right and no authority to impose these conditions upon its exercise of authority to improve the navigation of the river. It is not a matter of obstruction. There is no pretense that anything that is going to be done will obstruct navigation. It is conceded that these improvements are necessary—not only necessary, but highly important and beneficial; that there has been a crying need for them for years; and that efforts have been made to secure action by the Government itself in the way of making them. That being the case, I deny unqualifiedly that the Government has any power or any authority to repeat the precedents of the past with reference to this matter, but that a halt should be called now and forever upon the attempted exercise of this sovereign right to control navigation as subordinate to the creation of property to be conferred upon citizens and corporations.

The legal phases of this matter have been discussed at length in this Chamber, with their usual exhaustive ability, by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and by my own lamented predecessor, Senator Hughes, of Colorado. As I have before stated, the question never would have arisen but for the tremendous value of water power as an agency for hydroelectric purposes.

But it is said that there is a necessity for Federal control over matters of this sort because of the supineness or indifference or lack of authority on the part of the States to prevent these combinations, and their consequent effects upon the public. This has been asserted by very high authority, not once but several times, and frequently by the extreme advocates of conservation.

In other words, it is proposed that the Government of the United States shall exercise a power of supervision, through the agency of legislation like this, because the States either can not or will not control these huge aggregations; necessity, in other words, being pleaded for the existence and the exercise of the authority.

I need only suggest that if the national authority can invade the domain of State power upon the assumption that it is necessary because of the supineness or indifference of the State itself to undesirable public conditions, then the State, per contra, may do the same thing, as against the Nation, within its own borders. As a result thereof, reprisals would be the order of the day; and instead of having a constitutional government, we would be confronted with repeated conflicts of authority and usurpations of power, necessarily leading to anarchy if not to revolution, or to both.

The assumption that a power not existing can be invoked and exercised because necessary has always been the most dangerous element in popular government, and its recognition and enforcement have always proven most calamitous. Such a basis for the exercise of such an authority certainly can not be seriously urged in this Chamber on this or on any other occasion.

But the argument is without merit, Mr. President. Let me say right here that the interest of the West in this question is due to its interest in a policy which, perhaps for want of a better name, is known as conservation. These acts of Congress, affecting navigable rivers in the humid States, are merely pieces or parts of legislation that are supposed to dovetail into a common scheme of universal national supervision of what are called public resources. It is because of the fact that they are part of such a policy that they become of such tremendous importance to the people living in the public-land States, and particularly in the arid States, of the West.

I say, and I do not believe it can be successfully disputed, that all of the evils from which conservation was born, or nearly all of them, and to correct which legislation of this kind is resorted to, were the outgrowth of national legislation and national administration; that there is not, and never has been, a monopoly in any of the natural resources of this country which had not its origin and source in the laws of Congress and in their administration by the national authorities. I state that broadly, because I am not aware of any exception.

The forest-reserve policy furnishes a good illustration of this truth. It has been the prolific cause of more monopoly in the public lands than all other causes, perhaps, put together. That may be too broad a statement. Certainly it has been the prolific source of many of them.

For example, many forest reserves created under the operation of the law authorizing them have been extended so as to include within their boundaries much worthless property owned in fee by private individuals or by railroad or other corporations. Under the laws of the United States the owners of these lands have been freely permitted to exchange them for what are popularly known as lieu lands, or lands taken in exchange therefor. One can at once perceive the enormous possibilities for wrongdoing involved in such a condition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me the suggestion, scrip has been issued to be placed on similar lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I am coming to that also. In many instances lands have been taken to be afterwards included in forest reserves by the use of scrip, as the Senator from Arizona has suggested, for the sole and only purpose of thereafter exchanging those lands for the best timberlands in this or any other country.

I saw a statement the other day in one of the newspapers—I forget which—giving a list of the great timber owners of the country, with the Southern Pacific Co. at its head, owning, I think one hundred and twenty-two thousand millions of feet of standing timber, and Mr. Weyerhaeuser a very close second, with a number of other huge concerns bringing up in the rear. I assert, and I believe the record will show it, that the greater portion of that timber was acquired by these individuals and corporations through the manipulation by Federal authority of the law to create forest reserves. I know that in my own State individuals and corporations were active in securing an extension of the lines of so-called forest reserves so as to embrace lands upon which a tree never grew and never can grow, utterly worthless for forestry purposes but valuable for others, and which, after their inclusion in forest reserves, have been exchanged for magnificent acres of standing timber.

I am one of the advocates of the forest-reserve system, which, properly applied, must necessarily subserve a most beneficent purpose. But, Mr. President, forest reserves are the creation of national law, and their locations have been the result of national authority applied thereunder to the public domain, and manipulated for the creation of the greatest monopoly in timber that now exists anywhere in the civilized world.

Is it possible that the States, or any of them, can be accused of indifference or of neglect, or of want of power or of collusion with these interests, if you please, resulting in such tremendous consequences?

Take the coal lands: I can speak with some degree of personal knowledge with reference to some aspects of the so-called coal monopoly, for I well recall the summer in which the Union Pacific officials secured filings from almost every individual out of employment to be found on the streets of the city of Denver, which filings were immediately assigned to its officials, covering magnificent measures of virgin coal on the public domain of the United States, and near the line of the Union Pacific national highway.

Did this result from any inactivity on the part of the State? Can you tell me how the State of Colorado in any way could have prevented such conditions or such practices? These were carried on under the protection and through the medium of national law and administration. Of course, I do not pretend to say, nor do I want to be understood as meaning, that this conduct was even within the letter of the law, because I do not think it was, although it was claimed to be. I am merely stating a condition resulting from congressional legislation, and from the administration and application of the laws of the country by the Federal authorities over which the States could exercise no sort of restraint.

Take water power. The bills to which attention have been called, and the filings which have been made under the guise of securing land for agricultural and other purposes, have been the fruitful source of the monopoly in water power. After all these things have been accomplished, after these huge aggregations have acquired the very cream of the national resources, this policy of conservation has come to the front, justified very largely by them, but pressing in its application upon the innocent citizens of the West.

He who commits a crime sometimes suffers, but the weight of punishment falls upon others. The helpless wife and the innocent children bear the principal burden of his offending. By way of comparison I may say that we of the West, the helpless citizens of the country, are having these offenses against national law and national authority visited upon us and upon our children, I am afraid even to the third and the fourth generation. The reason given for it is that we, as a State, are either unable or unwilling to interfere with and to correct these monopolistic conditions, and by reason of that fact the doors of the stable must be locked after all the horses belonging to us, or all but two or three, have been stolen.

I assert broadly, therefore, that even if it were true that the national authority might be invoked because of inaction by the States without reference to the division of powers, the conditions here do not justify the taking of such action.

In this connection let me say that State administrations of the lands and resources of the States throughout the West at least have generally been in grateful and shining contrast to Federal administrations in the same section. The State of Texas perhaps does not realize how well off it has always been in that it owned its own public lands. We have an enormous area given to us by the largess of the Government for schools and kindred public or semipublic purposes. They have been administered ever since the admission of the State by a State land board wisely, prudently, economically, to the end that the purposes of the grant might be accomplished and the general welfare of all concerned in good administration might be promoted. We have sold much of that land to bona fide settlers. We have conveyed some of it at nominal prices to irrigation companies. But the bulk of it has been conserved in very truth, and the increment resulting from its use has been devoted to the purposes for which the grants were made.

When I describe this condition in my own State I am simply giving an example of that which, so far as I know, prevails generally throughout the West. We may say, therefore, that in handling these great public matters the administrations of the States have been far superior to the domestic administration of the General Government, and that the abuses which are now invoked as an excuse for our partial delimitation had their origin in Federal laws and in Federal administration. We therefore have some right, I think, to protest against this stretch of national power, only one aspect of which is involved in the bill now under consideration.

One test of the validity of an asserted power, I think, is found in ascertaining the extent to which it can be carried if its existence is admitted. If the Government of the United States has authority to enact this measure, it may enact many others concerning the subject matter of the grant. If it may be leased or disposed of for a term of years, it may be sold and conveyed outright. The Government may execute a deed of conveyance, or issue its patent for this asset, whatever it may be, just as well as to make a lease or a franchise of it for 50 years.

Do Senators believe it is possible that a patent of the Government may be issued to the Connecticut River Co. for the force or energy in the waters of the Connecticut River, or for the current, or for the structure, as is contended for by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]? Yet the one is quite as much within the authority of the Federal Government as the other. And if it may dispose of the surplus power for a revenue to be devoted to improving the river, why may it not be disposed of for a revenue to be used in improving the Missouri River, or, if you please, in paying the expenses of the Forest Reserve Bureau or the Pension Bureau? Or why may not the fund be turned into the Treasury on general account and utilized pro tanto for the payment of the expenses of the Government?

If the Government has the power to collect revenue by this method, you can place no limitations except those imposed by the Constitution upon the disposition to be made of the fund after it has been secured, and these may also be enlarged by construction.

I have already spoken of the exemption or the possible exemption of this property right from State taxation consequent upon the assertion of Federal control. If it is property, Mr. President, and we can grant to another the right to its use, why may not the Government use the power on its own account and operate it in competition with others in the same business? In other words, why may not the United States develop this power and become a manufacturer of and dealer in electric current, supplying power to the cities and citizens of Hartford, Springfield, and other communities in competition with those now engaged in the business? Being immune from State taxation, would it not have such an advantage over its competitors as ultimately to put them out of business if it were so disposed? And if it should find no market for the current thus produced, why may not the Government create one by invading the street railroad business, if you please, or by building establishments of its own for the manufacture of articles of merchandise, and so utilize the power as to bring the highest possible revenue? Why may it not go still further and develop power on its own account in all parts of the Nation to be used in its own pursuits, thus coming in competition with the people everywhere on every river in the country susceptible of such a pursuit?

Let me again say that I should much prefer that method of procedure to what is here proposed if the Government has the power to act at all. It would be far better for the people of this Nation, in my judgment, if this water power is a great national asset, that instead of conferring it on any terms upon private corporations the Government should utilize it directly and through its own agencies for the benefit and welfare of the masses of this country.

Another consequence which must flow from the exercise of this power or this authority or this property right, by whatever name it may be called, is that if it is a Government asset the latter may not only use it as it may determine, by sale or lease or operation on its own account, but it may refrain from using it at all and prohibit its use by anybody else. In other words, it may lay an embargo upon a great national asset by denying to others the right to develop it and by refusing to develop it on its own account. If it is property and owned by the Government in its proprietory capacity, then its ownership is without limitation as to power of disposition, of control, of operation, or of refusal to operate.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], in discussing this branch of the proposition and in asserting Federal ownership and control, referred to certain instances where the Government, in permitting bridges to be thrown over navigable waters, reserved the right to cross them with its troops free of charge, and also to the custom in some of the States, when they have surplus room not needed for public purposes in public buildings, of leasing them to attorneys and others, as analogies to this situation. In the instance of the bridge, if the Government imposed as a condition to its permit a percentage by way of rent or compensation upon the receipts of the bridge company, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, it might be an analogous instance. But the mere fact that a reservation is made of the right to use the bridge for a governmental purpose is for different from the right to use an item of property created by private capital as a source of revenue to itself and imposed under a claim of ownership thereof by the Government as contradistinguished from the State or the maker of the improvement, or both.

The analogy furnished by the Senator's illustration is parallel to that of reserving the right to generate power from the current or requiring the grantee to supply power to the Government free of charge for the operation of the improvement after it is made. While it may be true, and doubtless is true, that in many instances the State authorities lease superfluous rooms in public buildings and obtain a revenue thereby, I know of no instance in which the Government of the United States has done it, or in which it has been deemed permissible.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] inquired of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], during the course of the discussion, what his opinion was with reference to the power of the Government of the United States, as I understood the question, in dealing with a corporation like the Connecticut River Co. to endow it with the right to exercise the power of eminent domain within the State, and I understood the reply to be that in some instances that could be done. But can it be done except that it may be exercised for the purpose of improving navigation? For example, can the Connecticut River Co., under the provisions of this bill, or under any provision that might be inserted in it, exercise the right to condemn property in the State of Connecticut which might be necessary for the purpose of enabling the company to carry out the purposes and objects of its existence, the generation of power and the sale of current? But if the company is dependent upon the United States and an act of Congress for its authority to do business and for the utilization of its property held by virtue of the laws of Connecticut, may it not be said to be equally within the power of the United States to confer upon it a general authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, notwithstanding such exercise might in the manner directed conflict with the requirements of the laws of Connecticut upon the same subject? When once we admit the existence of this Federal authority we can place no limitation upon the consequences that may flow from it. We arm the Government with a power so vast in its proportions as to be practically beyond the ken of man to predict the ultimate extent to which it may be carried.

I do not, of course, assert that it would be carried to an extreme. I do not believe it would. I know the composition of the body which I am now addressing would have to change very materially to make such a result possible. But the test of an authority asserted is the extent of its possible operation in the event its existence is conceded or established.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that when we consider what the Government may do, even were this authority conceded, we should hesitate to apply or exercise it except in some instance of the most urgent and exigent character.

Mr. President, I prefer to continue what I have to say, if the Senate will consent, some time after the order of business set for to-morrow has ended. I can continue to-day if desired, but I shall probably have to occupy the time of the Senate for about an hour longer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of what the Senator from Colorado has stated, and in view of the fact that there is an order upon the calendar as to the counting of the electoral votes, stating that the Senate has agreed to leave the Chamber "at 10 minutes before 1 o'clock on Wednesday, February 12, 1913," and "proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives," unless there is some other Senator who desires to occupy more time this evening, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12.40 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate now take a recess——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Chair please withhold that motion for the introduction of a report? Will it be permissible to present a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that unless it relates to one of the excepted classes it can not be received. If it relates to an appropriation bill or if it is a conference report it will be in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is desirable that it shall be presented if the rule will permit it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless it relates to an appropriation bill or a conference report it can not be received.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate now stand in recess until to-morrow at 12.40 p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m., Tuesday, February 11) the Senate took a recess until Wednesday, February 12, 1913, at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1913.

The House met at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite spirit, God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee that in the eternal fitness of things virtue is its own reward, while sin is its own condemnation; that defeat calls for explanation, while victory explains itself. Help us, therefore, to abhor that which is evil and cleave to that which is good, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28283, the Agriculture appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28283, the Agriculture appropriation bill, with Mr. BEALL of Texas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation of soils and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $175,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if the item which appears on page 43, lines 1 to 3, is the appropriation for soil surveys?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not there is an increase in the appropriation over what it was for the present fiscal year, and if so, how much?

Mr. LAMB. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman what the estimate for this purpose was?

Mr. LAMB. They asked $20,000 and we gave them half.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think $175,000 will be sufficient for the work that ought to be done in the next fiscal year?

Mr. LAMB. The committee were of the opinion that it is.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is all, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Salaries, Bureau of Entomology: One entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,500; 1 executive assistant, $2,250; 1 chief clerk, $1,800; 1 clerk, class 4; 3 clerks, class 3; 6 clerks, class 2; 5 clerks, class 1; 6 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 superintendent of moth work, $2,750; 1 entomological assistant, $1,800; 2 entomological draftsmen, at $1,400 each; 1 entomological draftsman, $1,080; 4 foremen, at $1,080 each; 2 entomological preparators, at $840 each; 1 entomological preparator, $720; 6 entomological preparators, at $600 each; 1 messenger, $840; 2 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 1 mechanic, $840; 1 mechanic, $750; 1 laborer, $540; 2 charwomen, at $480 each; 1 charwoman, $240; in all, $59,910.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph, in lines 12 and 13, "one entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,500."

Mr. CANDLER. We can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. On lines 12 and 13, page 43, this paragraph provides "one entomologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,500." The statute provides for one entomologist in the Department of Agriculture at a salary of $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from South Carolina if they know of any change in that statute?

Mr. LAMB. Nothing except what has been said on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of the Montana National Bison Range and other reservations under supervision of the Biological Survey, including construction of fencing, wardens' quarters, shelters for animals, landings, roads, trails, bridges, ditches, telephone lines, rockwork, bulkheads, and other improvements necessary for the economical administration and protection of the reservations, and for the enforcement of section 84 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," $21,000, of which sum $2,500 shall be used for the purchase, capture, and transportation of game for national reservations.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 47, by inserting, after line 12, the following:
"For protection and improvement of the Wind Cave National Game Preserve in South Dakota, $2,500."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I think a point of order would lie against that. I reserve it, if the gentleman wants to speak.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a year ago a national game preserve was established in one of the national parks of South Dakota, embracing an area of some 10,000 acres, and the jurisdiction placed under the Department of Agriculture. I suppose that under this paragraph undoubtedly the Secretary will have funds and authority to administer that preserve, so far as the matter of the placing of game and their care is concerned. There is, however, another feature of that park which differs from the ordinary game preserve. The Wind Cave itself is a very remarkable cavern, of a very large extent, and some years ago was created into a park upon the requisition of the Department of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and other officials, and there is a superintendent employed there at a salary of $900, and a small hotel for the accommodation of visitors, a building over the entrance to the cave, and each year the sum of $2,500 has come in the usual estimates for the maintenance of this place. Against that there are certain revenues which come to the park by virtue of licenses for automobiles that bring visitors from near-by places. This $2,500 item appears in the estimates for the current year from the Department of the Interior, and in the sundry civil bill there has appeared this item at different times, but it occurred to me that inasmuch as the jurisdiction of the premises is now in the Department of Agriculture, we ought not to have this dual method of appropriating a part for the care of the game, which, of course, would include a warden and other necessary expenses, and a part for the convenience of visitors to the cavern itself, but that it ought to be carried under one jurisdiction.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will.

Mr. COX. I see that the act creating this Wind Cave National Park Reserve gave the power for purchase or condemnation of adjacent lands. Can the gentleman tell the committee whether any lands have been condemned for that purpose?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There has been none condemned. There are two or three pieces that contain an additional water supply, on which the Secretary of Agriculture has taken options.

Mr. COX. What is the sum total of the land that has been purchased or that they contemplate purchasing?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. None has been purchased, but the sum total is in the neighborhood of $8,000 or $10,000, or something like that.

Mr. COX. What does it cost per acre to purchase?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Very little, indeed. There is one option on 160 acres at $2,000.

Mr. COX. One hundred and sixty acres?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. One hundred and sixty acres, and I may say the sole purpose of buying these small tracts is for increasing the water supply for the animals of the preserve.

Mr. LAMB. I think I can satisfy the gentleman about this matter. It is current law, and therefore it has been omitted here, but $25,000 will be available to be expended.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is the item carried in that bill for the current year for the purpose of purchasing this additional land for water supply to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has referred, and also for fencing the preserve, which is in process of construction now, or about to be constructed.

Mr. LAMB. I think it will all be taken care of under this appropriation bill.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will remind the gentleman that the Secretary of the Interior has sent in with the estimates for the coming fiscal year the item which I have here offered, and it is only a question as to whether that part of the administration which has reference to the cave itself and the accommodation of visitors, some thousands of whom visit there every summer, should be carried in this bill or in another one, and I thought the whole subject ought to be taken care of under one administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAMB. I will say that the department did not ask for it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to get a little information here. I see this item on page 47 provides for the construction of wardens' quarters. Is there any limitation on the amount of money that can be expended for that construction?

Mr. LAMB. Six hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. COX. It can not exceed that?

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. COX. Another question. This item carries $2,500 for the purchase, capture, and transportation of game for national reservations. What kind of game is it that it is proposed to purchase for that $2,500? And what good is it proposed to do to the people of this country? Can the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] answer that question as to what kind of game is proposed to be purchased with this item of $2,500, and what general good is to be subserved to the people of this country by it?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that the committee probably have more information and more familiarity with that general proposition than I; but I may say with reference to this Montana National Bison Range that the American Bison Society has agreed to furnish free of any cost to the Government a herd of buffalo for that preserve, and there are abundant elk under the control of the Government now.

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman will permit, I can perhaps inform him on that point. It is political "game."

Mr. LAMB. I do not think the gentleman is correct about that. This is a project to preserve the game in this country. It is very important. This small amount of $2,500 is to provide such game as they need in this range. It is for the preservation of the species of such game.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. COX. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out on page 47, beginning with the word "of," the remainder of line 11 and all of line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will withhold a moment, the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] should be first disposed of. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, beginning with the word "of," in line 11, I move to strike out the remainder of line 11 and all of line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 47, by striking out after the word "of," in line 11, the remainder of line 11 and all of line 12.

Mr. COX. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. It seems I am unable to get any information that will satisfy my mind about this matter—anything showing it is a matter of necessity at all. I am unable to get information as to what kind of game they propose to buy and what general benefit is to inure to the people at large in consequence of this item.

Now, I am not opposed to any appropriation whatever in this bill which can plainly be seen to inure to the benefit of the people of this country. But here is an appropriation which appears, so far as I have been able to discover, for the first time it has ever occurred in this bill, and it is simply a beginning, an entering wedge, to further appropriations of this sort.

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. COX. In a very few years this House will be called upon to appropriate countless thousands of dollars for the purpose of buying game, and no public benefit can come from it.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not subject to a point of order?

Mr. COX. I do not think it is. But I think my amendment ought to prevail. The item ought to go out of this bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to be heard for a moment on this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. LEVER. The Bureau of Biological Survey is engaged in a number of lines of work. One of them is the preservation of the various species of game in this country, especially those species that are rapidly disappearing from this continent, and while we may not be able to trace any actual money benefit to the people from this appropriation, yet I think there is not a Member of Congress here who is not interested in the proposition of preserving the game species of this country. I think there is no man here who would object to a small appropriation for the purpose of buying bison or buffalo or some other species that is rapidly disappearing.

Mr. COX. I understood from the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] that the friends of that species of game are willing to stand the entire expense of buying the bison.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I was simply speaking of that particular reserve that the gentleman was inquiring about. I have no doubt that this item is justified.

Mr. GARNER. The department did not request that a provision should be carried in the bill to the effect that $2,500 must be expended. Are you going to expend it whether it is advisable or not? Why not leave it to their discretion?

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to my friend from Texas that that is true. This item might better be worded by inserting the word "may" instead of "shall," but it has been carried in this way in the appropriation bill from year to year, and I am confident that the man at the head of this service will use it wisely and for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit an interruption right there, may I ask him if the man at the head of this bureau has expended the $2,500, and, if so, what kind of game has he bought with it?

Mr. LEVER. I can not put my hand on that information just at this moment, but——

Mr. LAMB. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman from Indiana says that this is something new, he is mistaken. I hold in my hand a copy of last year's act and a copy of the act of the year before, and they both contain that item of appropriation.

Mr. COX. Then I withdraw my statement about that. Although this is a small item, it is simply calling upon Congress to maintain this practice.

Mr. LAMB. This is a legitimate line of work in the direction indicated.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia permit me?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, the Agricultural Department ought to furnish your committee with some information as to how the money was expended and the necessity for it in the future. It does seem a ridiculous proposition for the committee to come in here with an appropriation as simple as $2,500, when the department has not given any information to the committee as to how they have spent the money or the necessity for it in the future.

Mr. LAMB. Why, yes; it is only a part of the sum of $21,000 which may be used in the discretion of the Secretary——

Mr. COX. Oh, no; you say "shall be used."

Mr. LAMB. "Shall" means "may" and "may" means "shall."

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion. I move to strike out from line 11, page 47, the word "shall."

Mr. LAMB. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying noxious animals, and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $55,000, of which sum $15,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests and public lands in California.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia in reference to the proposition of authorizing the destruction of ground squirrels on public lands in California in addition to the national forests? Is it designed to have the Government enter upon the project of destroying squirrels on all of the public lands of the United States?

Mr. LAMB. Where they raid on farms and destroy the products of the farmer they are a great nuisance, a pest. The farmer can not go out into the forest reserves and destroy them, and somebody must do it.

Mr. MANN. We have for years, I believe, made some appropriation for the destruction of squirrels in the national forests. That is because we keep control of the national forests and do all the administrative work; but this proposition now is to go outside of the national forests and undertake the destruction of ground squirrels on public lands. If we do that in California, why not do it all over the country?

Mr. LAMB. I suppose private citizens would not be permitted to go into the forests.

Mr. MANN. I am not raising any question as to the destruction of squirrels in the national forests. That policy we entered upon, but why do you enlarge it now by undertaking to destroy squirrels on the public lands?

Mr. LAMB. I will read from the hearings on this subject:

Mr. LEVER. What is the principal necessity for $15,000 for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests in California?

Mr. HENSHAW. That has to do with the prevention of the plague, and is a very serious matter in California. Let me say that the State has passed a law compelling the landowners to free their lands of these ground squirrels; if they do not do the work then the county supervisor has the right to do it and charge it up against the land. Now, the complaint is made that while the farmers are willing to do their part of it they say the Government owns large areas of forest land and large areas of public land which are infested with ground squirrels, and they say it is not fair to compel them to kill off the ground squirrels on their lands if you kept a nursery right outside the boundaries which reinfests their lands.

Mr. MANN. That statement all relates to national forests, but here it is proposed at this time to enter upon the destruction of squirrels on the public lands. We have had this matter up before the House on repeated occasions. The provision has never got into the bill; I do not know whether it was kept out on a point of order or not, but I think the gentleman from Virginia ably opposed the provision last year, and other Members did. If we undertake to destroy the ground squirrels on all of the public lands of the Government throughout the country, why not also undertake to destroy other pests?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will pardon me, as I understand, the object of destroying these squirrels in California is to prevent the spread of a very dangerous disease. Under our power to control the public health, would we not have a right to do that?

Mr. GARNER. It is not a question of right; it is a question of advisability.

Mr. SIMS. It would seem to be advisable to kill them in the States where they are likely to spread this disease.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What disease is it that they are likely to spread?

Mr. SIMS. The bubonic plague.

Mr. MANN. We have had this matter discussed by the week in times past.

Mr. GARNER. And the gentleman from Virginia was very much opposed to the amendment last year.

Mr. LAMB. We sometimes reverse ourselves; we may be a defender to-day and a prosecutor to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language in line 20, page 47, "and public land."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Salaries, Division of Accounts and Disbursements: One chief of division and disbursing clerk, who shall be administrative officer of the fiscal affairs of the department, $4,000; 1 assistant chief of division, $2,750; 1 chief of office of accounts and fiscal agent, $2,500; 7 district fiscal agents, at $2,000 each; 1 supervising auditor, $2,250; 1 auditor, $2,000; 1 cashier and chief clerk, $2,250; 1 deputy disbursing clerk, $2,000; 2 accountants and bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; 2 clerks, class 4; 11 clerks, class 3; 18 clerks, class 2; 9 clerks, class 1; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; 1 custodian of records and files, $1,400; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger or messenger boy, $600.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. In lines 9, 10, and 11, page 48, provision is made for a disbursing clerk at $4,000. The statute provides that such disbursing clerk shall receive a salary of $1,800. I make a point of order against that part of the paragraph. Also, in line 14 there is an increase, one cashier and chief clerk at $2,250, an increase of $250. I make a point of order against that increase.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, just one remark. This increase of $250 is for an employee who has been in the Government service for about 15 years, who is under bond, and who is a very efficient man. During the absence of the chief of the division he looks after the work of the disbursing officer as assistant chief, and is detailed at the Weather Bureau. I concede the point of order in each case.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LAMB. I ask to return to line 14, and to insert the figures "$2,000" in place of the "$2,250" stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 14, amend by inserting, after the word "clerk," the figures "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS.

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,250; 1 editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,500; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 2 assistant editors, at $2,000 each; 4 assistant editors, at $1,800 each; 1 assistant editor, $1,600; 1 assistant editor, $1,400; 1 assistant editor in charge of indexing, $2,000; 1 indexer, $1,400; 1 assistant in charge of illustrations, $2,000; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,600; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,500; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,400; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,300; 6 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,200 each; 1 assistant photographer, $900; 1 assistant in charge of document section, $2,000; 1 assistant in document section, $1,800; 1 foreman, miscellaneous distribution, $1,500; 1 forewoman, $1,400; 1 clerk, class 3; 7 clerks, class 1; 13 clerks, at $1,000 each; 41 clerks, at $900 each; 21 clerks, at $840 each; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 9 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 4 skilled laborers, at $780 each; 16 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 1 chief folder, $1,000; 2 folders, at $900 each; 1 skilled laborer, $1,100; 1 skilled laborer, $1,000; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 2 messengers, at $720 each; 3 messengers or messenger boys, at $600 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $420 each; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 laborer, $840; 1 laborer, $600; 4 charwomen, at $480 each; 3 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $165,010.

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 49, lines 2 and 3, there is a provision for four assistant editors at $1,800 each, a change in the salaries of three of these editors from $1,600 to $1,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. On the same page, in line 6, one draftsman or photographer at $1,600, a change from $1,500 to $1,600. A point of order against that change.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is sure that this is an increase? It is not shown by the report.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOWLER. In line 13, at the beginning of the line, one forewoman, $1,400, an increase of $200, against which I do not desire to make any point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 49 to correct the totals there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will offer his amendment.

Mr. LAMB. In lines 2 and 3, page 49, amend by inserting "$1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 49, line 2, by inserting: "three assistant editors at $1,800 each."

Mr. FOWLER. It ought to be three.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia please repeat that amendment?

Mr. LAMB. In line 6, "one draftsman or photographer, $1,500."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 49, line 6, by inserting, after "$2,000," the words "one draftsman or photographer, $1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. There is another assistant editor in line 3. On page 49, lines 2 and 3, amend by inserting "four assistant editors, at $1,500 each."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not $1,600?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; $1,600. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, lines 2 and 3, insert "4 assistant editors at $1,600 each."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, in the same line, I desire to ask if the point of order was not sustained against one assistant editor at $1,600 because it was an increase of $100? That should be amended so as to be $1,500.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, amend by inserting, in line 3, "1 assistant editor, $1,500."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in lines 2 and 3 there is a change of three editors from $1,600 to $1,800.

Mr. LAMB. We have offered an amendment changing them back to $1,600 and it has been adopted.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair. They put back four assistant editors at $1,600.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be three editors at $1,600 each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the point of order that the gentleman is making?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did the Chair put the question on the amendment, in line 2, for two assistant editors at $1,800 each?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the recollection of the Chair that there is one assistant editor at $1,600, and the point of order was sustained to that, and the Chair has not yet put an amendment on that.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have that amendment voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to insert $1,500 in lieu of what now appears to be $1,600.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 49, line 2, there is a provision for four assistant editors at $1,800 each. It ought to be one assistant editor at $1,800 and four assistant editors at $1,600.

Mr. LEVER. That is correct.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not so understand it. I understand that there has been only a correction of two editors at $1,600, whereas there ought to have been a correction of three assistant editors.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state what he understands to be the situation. As the item appeared in the bill, it was four assistant editors at $1,800 each. The gentleman from Illinois directed a point of order against that because it was an increase of salary from $1,600 to $1,800.

Mr. FOWLER. For three editors.

The CHAIRMAN. That item went out. It appears in the bill as four editors. As the Chair understands the matter, under the rules the committee has the right to increase the number of assistant editors, but no right to increase the salary that heretofore prevailed for that place.

Mr. LAMB. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order. Then the gentleman from Virginia offered an amendment to insert four assistant editors at $1,600 each. The gentleman from Illinois directed a point of order against that, which the Chair overruled, and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. LAMB. This provides for a promotion of three assistant editors from $1,600 to $1,800 each, an increase of $200 in each case.

Mr. FOWLER. If that amendment was offered and agreed to, I did not so understand, because the paragraph carries one assistant editor at $1,600 when it ought to be three.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman made the point of order against that because it was a raise of $100, from $1,500 to $1,600, and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. The amendment ought to be for three assistant editors at $1,600 each.

Mr. LAMB. I move to amend:

Page 49, lines 2 and 3, strike out "four assistant editors, at $1,800 each," and insert "one assistant editor, $1,800."

Same page, line 3, strike out "one assistant editor, $1,600," and insert "four assistant editors, at $1,600 each."

Same page, at the end of line 6, strike out "$1,600" and insert "$1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the amendment for four. That was in order, and it was adopted.

Mr. LAMB. No; the Chair is mistaken. The amendment I have just offered is in keeping with the point of order made and sustained, and restores the language and salaries carried in the current law.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Salaries, Bureau of Statistics: One statistician, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of bureau, $2,500; 1 chief clerk, $1,800; 6 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 12 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,300 each; 17 clerks, class 1; 17 clerks, at $1,000 each; 21 clerks, at $900 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 2 messengers or laborers, at $720 each; 2 messengers, messenger boys, or laborers, at $660 each; 1 messenger or messenger boy, $480; 1 charwoman, $540; 2 charwomen, at $360 each; in all, $115,380.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph. In lines 23 and 24 there is a provision for one statistician who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000. The Revised Statutes provide for a statistician at $2,000, and I make the point of order against this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIBRARY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Salaries, Library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; 1 clerk, class 3; 1 clerk, class 2; 2 clerks, class 1, one of whom shall be a translator; 6 clerks, at $1,000 each; 5 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 2 cataloguers, at $1,200 each; 3 cataloguers, at $1,000 each; 1 messenger, $720; 2 messengers or messenger boys, at $600 each; 1 messenger, messenger boy, or laborer, $480; 1 charwoman, $480; in all, $27,020.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph, especially that portion in regard to one librarian, $2,000. The Revised Statutes provide for one librarian for this department at $1,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SLAYDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4043. An act divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: For stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, and matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, telephoning, postage, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings, grounds, and heating apparatus; for the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles, for official purposes only; for the payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the expense of the dispatch agent in New York; for official traveling expenses; and for other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the department, $106,066.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 53, line 8, by striking out the period and inserting a semicolon and the following language: "Provided, That not exceeding $1,000 may be used for the purchase of an oil painting of James Wilson, late Secretary of Agriculture, for the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I would rather the gentleman would make his point of order.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to be heard on the point of order. The language of the amendment, I think, is so drawn as to make it distinctly and definitely a limitation upon this appropriation. It leaves it within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase an oil painting of the late Secretary of Agriculture. It does not direct the Secretary of Agriculture to do anything. It leaves it to his discretion, and I think the rule is pretty well established by the House that an amendment in the form of a limitation upon an appropriation bill is in order upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In point of fact, how can a proposition to buy something which we have not heretofore had be a limitation on an expenditure?

Mr. LEVER. It is not a direction, I will say to my friend from Texas, to do anything; it is leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to buy something if he desires to exercise his discretion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, amending the question, how can that conditional purchase, or authority to make a purchase of something we have not yet had, possibly be a limitation on expenditures?

Mr. LEVER. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that in the Department of Agriculture we now have an oil painting of each of the Secretaries of Agriculture who have held that office heretofore. The purchase, I understand, was made out of the contingent expenses of the Department of Agriculture, but this committee thought that it was due to the Secretary of Agriculture that this Congress ought to recognize his 16 years of splendid service in the interest of the American people by distinctly saying that Congress wanted an oil painting made of him that it might be used in the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.] I want to say, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will reserve his point of order, because I have doubt it is in order myself——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. COX. I will reserve the point of order as long as the gentleman wishes to be heard on it.

Mr. LEVER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, this: The Federal Government was a long, long while in giving recognition to agriculture in this country, although the fathers of the country, including Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton, in the very dawn of the Nation foresaw that agriculture was to be its chief asset. It was not until 1862 that any substantial recognition was given to this great occupation of mankind. In fact, up to that time agriculture was not considered a profession; it was considered an occupation in which anybody with a strong piece of land, a strong mule, and a strong pair of arms could do just about as well as anybody else; but in 1862 President Lincoln signed a bill which established the agricultural colleges of this country. Following that came the Hatch Act in 1887, and then, in 1887, too, the Department of Agriculture was created, and this great profession of so many of our people was given a seat at the Cabinet table of the President of the United States. We have had four Secretaries of Agriculture since the creation of the Department of Agriculture—Norman J. Colman, of Missouri; J. M. Rusk, of Wisconsin; J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska; and James Wilson. Secretary Wilson has served as head of this department for 16 years—longer than any man has ever served in any Cabinet position in the history of our Government.

I have been intimately associated with him in his work for 10 years. He is a Republican from a rock-ribbed Republican State. I am from a rock-ribbed Democratic State, but in the administration of the affairs of that great department, which in 16 years he has built up to be one of the most useful in this country, Secretary Wilson has never known party or sectional lines. [Applause.] I believe it can be said with complete truthfulness that there is not a man in official life to-day who is more universally loved by the people that I have the honor to represent in part than is James Wilson. [Applause.] I wish every Member of Congress could have witnessed the scene I witnessed, along with the other members of the Committee on Agriculture last week, when Secretary Wilson rose before 800 boys and girls from the South—the Corn Club boys and the Tomato Club girls—the splendid ovation given the old man, and I wish you could have seen how deeply touched he was by it. This amendment of mine proposes to set aside the small sum of $1,000 to show the appreciation which I feel every Member of Congress feels, on this side and on that, for the splendid services rendered this country by James Wilson. His life, coming as he did from Scotland to this country a mere boy, and the work he has accomplished are an inspiration to every farm boy in America. You may walk through the corridors of every public building in Washington over which presides a Cabinet officer, and you will see oil paintings there of past Secretaries, of Jefferson, of all the great leaders that have gone before, and it does seem to me that this Congress ought to be willing to set aside this small sum to commemorate the services, the statesmanship, the broad-minded liberality of this great man who has presided over this great department and made it what it is during the past 16 years. [Applause.]

And I earnestly hope that my friend from Indiana [Mr. Cox], representing, as he does, a great agricultural constituency and a great State, who himself believes in the ultimate destiny of these people as an agricultural people, will not press this point of order against this little tribute to this great chieftain, this great leader of agricultural thought, this great man who is about to leave us.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. I just want to inquire if there ever has been an appropriation made for an oil painting for any of his predecessors?

Mr. LEVER. There never has been a distinct appropriation, but each one of these men—Mr. Colman, Mr. Morton, and Mr. Rusk—have their oil paintings in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And have these paintings to which you refer been bought without authority?

Mr. LEVER. I so understand—without expressed authority. I have not been able to find any authority in the law, but they are there, and they were bought out of these funds. But we do not want Secretary Wilson's picture bought in that way. We want this Congress to pay a just tribute to a great man. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman's statement is a rather serious indictment of previous administrations of the Department of Agriculture, and suggests that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture might well have done some work in the line of investigation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. In just one moment. I make the statement without having investigated the matter thoroughly. I have not gone back to all the acts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And so this is the first time an attempt has ever been made to authorize it?

Mr. LEVER. That is my judgment, without a thorough investigation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that every department of the Government has adopted the same course through every party administration.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And the gentleman also knows it has resulted in the purchase of pictures here in the Capital and in the accumulation of a large number of portraits and paintings that reflect no credit on the country as works of art.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman knows the same thing is true of the pictures of the Presidents in the White House.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not go that far.

Mr. MANN. I mean as to the purchase.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I mean as to the artistic excellence of the portraits.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the House of Representatives did the same thing as to ex-Speakers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It authorized by a distinct act of Congress the purchase of a job lot of pictures, and bad enough they mostly were.

Mr. MANN. It was only recently that the gentleman's committee reported in a bill to repicture the Halls of the House—throw away the old pictures and put in new ones.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No; to paint the pictures of Speakers whose portraits had not already been painted.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And appropriated $9,500 for painting 19 pictures and naming the originals.

Mr. MANN. And threw away the old ones that we had, which were purchased in the same manner—out of the contingent fund.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was a waste.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not think any painting was thrown away.

Mr. MANN. They were not paintings. They were lithographic pictures.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if it is not better administration to make a specific appropriation for painting the portrait of the head of a great department than to have the picture made, as it was made in one instance that I know of, where the picture was paid for out of an appropriation for a miscellaneous fund for the particular department concerned and was itemized as "paint, oils, and canvas, $500"? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In that case it was properly itemized, was it not?

Mr. MANN. I believe that was discussed in the House, but I think it is better to make a specific appropriation. That we shall have a picture in the end is inevitable. Why not give Secretary Wilson the proper tribute?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think there should be some condition stated in the statute that the portrait shall at least be made by some one capable of making a desirable portrait?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I shall be willing to trust the judgment of the next Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. BURLESON, in making appropriate arrangements for the work. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course, if you get a Texan at the head of that department, the work will be done properly. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe the author of the amendment practically concedes the point of order is well taken. I do not desire to detain the committee but for a very short time. I do not care what Mr. Wilson's politics is, though he differs from me politically. I freely subscribe to everything that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has said about Mr. Wilson's greatness. If I recollect aright, he became the head of that great department when its expenditures were only about $2,000,000 a year. He has presided over its destinies and aided in its growth until the sum now carried in this bill, after he has carried on his great work for 16 years, amounts to something between $17,000,000 and $18,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, you could appropriate $100,000 or any other amount to have Mr. Wilson's picture painted and it would never add one iota to his greatness. He is already enthroned in the hearts of the farmers of this country, and there is no doubt in my mind but that he will live in the hearts of his countrymen, dear to each and every one of them, for countless ages yet to come. While I concede his greatness, Mr. Chairman, I object to appropriations being made in this way and in this manner.

We have a committee organized in this House, ably presided over by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], whose duty it is to report bills to this House, when he sees fit, covering the identical subject or subjects intended to be covered by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. I hope that no man will feel for a moment that in urging this point I do it on any political grounds whatever.

Mr. MANN. We do, though.

Mr. COX. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois does not believe that for a minute, and he knows he does not believe it.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I do.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. COX. And no other man who has known me for six years will believe that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not particularly appropriate that this House in the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill should make this appropriation for a portrait of James Wilson?

Mr. COX. No. If I did I would not make this point of order.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I should like to know why not?

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman and tell him why. A bill should be brought in here in the natural way and in the natural channel for that purpose. It has been admitted here this morning that appropriations for contingent expenses have heretofore been used for this purpose without any authority of law whatever; but does any man believe for a moment that we would be justified, without any warrant of law, in appropriating this sum or any other sum——

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what we are trying to do now.

Mr. COX (continuing). For the purpose of having a portrait painted of any Cabinet officer?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. LAMB. I have sat here and listened to what my colleague on the committee [Mr. LEVER] has said, and I want to say frankly that I did not know anything about this amendment, because the matter was taken up in the committee when I was called out for one purpose or other, and I did not notice the record when I returned. But I want to say that this amendment does, in the open and in the presence of this House, exactly what has been done heretofore under this contingent-fund appropriation, as I am informed, with reference to the other Secretaries of Agriculture, and it will only pay to this worthy retiring officer a deserved tribute that has already been paid to his predecessors in office.

And, while I admit that the point of order lies, I hope the gentleman from Indiana, after what has been suggested here, will withdraw this point of order and allow this portrait of a worthy, noble, patriotic officer, whose heart is equal to his head, to hang in the Department of Agriculture when he has retired from office, loved and honored by his countrymen. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I suggest to the gentleman that he do not disarm the Chair in advance by admitting the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels obliged to hold, under the rule, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is not a limitation, but affirmative legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana to withhold his point of order for a minute.

Mr. COX. I only made it in the interest of time.

Mr. HAUGEN. May I have a minute?

Mr. COX. I will withhold it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, we all take a just and pardonable pride in our Nation's growth and greatness, and in the fact that we are living in this age of marvelous expansion. And no matter what one's political affiliation, creed, or occupation may be, as has been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], our duty to give honest and thoughtful consideration to the development of our farm and natural resources, to see to it that every consideration is given to the development of mechanical appliances, the skill and genius of American labor—for the upbuilding of this great Nation. I wish to record the statement here that no man has contributed more to this Nation's growth and greatness, especially agriculture, than this great and grand man, James Wilson, of Iowa [applause], and I believe that Congress can well afford to spend a few thousand dollars in recognition of his great service. He needs no eulogy here. His popularity is not confined to the border lines of the State of Iowa or of the District of Columbia. No, it has gone far beyond the border lines of these; yes, even beyond those of our Nation, into the remotest parts of this world. I trust that the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his point of order. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman renew the point of order?

Mr. COX. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Forest Service, $25,075.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 16, after "Forest Service," strike out "$25,075" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, we have no information touching this particular item. Let me say here for the information of the committee that there is no change in the total amount of the appropriation for rent in the District of Columbia, although several changes have been made in the amounts specified for rent for the various bureaus. The total amount provided in this bill, $95,329, is the same as that carried in the act for the current fiscal year. If this item in line 16 is changed it will disarrange these other amounts apportioned for rent in other bureaus.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional rent in cases of emergency for any bureau, division, or office of the department, $7,608.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture as to this item—

For additional rent in cases of emergency for any bureau, division, or office of the department.

How does the committee get the amount of $608? Why is it not $8,000 or $7,000, when this is an emergency appropriation, the amount of which no one can determine? Why was it figured down to $7,608?

Mr. LAMB. So far as the fractional amount is concerned I can not tell the gentleman, but it is very wise to provide for any emergency that may arise by reason of accident, fire, or what not, such as comes to all business people everywhere. In proof of that, just a day or two ago they had a fire down there which will necessitate the renting of other quarters.

Mr. MANN. I think I can give the gentleman from New York the information he asks for. Each bureau figures up the amount that it is actually paying for rent and that is carried in the item, and then the committee, desiring not to make any increase in the total appropriation for the year, subtract the total of rent paid by the different bureaus from the total of the appropriation for the current year. In the current law this emergency appropriation was $10,000, and by this method of subtraction the amount left is $7,608.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is a very ingenious theory.

Mr. MANN. There is no theory about it at all. That is the fact.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Office of Experiment Stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," the sums apportioned to the several States and Territories to be paid quarterly in advance, $720,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at end of line 23, page 54, the following: "Provided, That $50,000 of said sum shall be used for the purpose of establishing one of said stations at Plainview, Tex."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman withhold it for a moment?

Mr. LAMB. Out of reverence to my friend, I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that a bill for this purpose has passed the Senate. I have been diligently endeavoring to get the bill reported favorably by the Committee on Agriculture, and I know that it should be passed for the benefit of the plains of Texas. There are about 40 counties that this agricultural experimental station would serve by demonstrating to the people the benefits of improved agricultural methods. This is a new country, and an experiment station would be of great benefit to the agricultural interests in connection with the State work now being carried on there. It has been earnestly requested by the beautiful little city of Plainview and by the State authorities and also by the United States authorities to be located at this point. The Committee on Agriculture of this House has not as yet seen fit to report the bill, but has turned it down, and I now sincerely hope that they will accept this amendment. That part of the country is a semiarid country, consisting of level plains, and the soil is very rich and suitable for wheat and cereal crops and has developed into a fine farming and stock-raising country.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is not Texas getting the $15,000 out of the $720,000?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think so.

Mr. MANN. If you take off $50,000 from this $720,000 which States would lose it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It would come out of the lump sum.

Mr. MANN. But some States would have to lose it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Each State, I suppose, would lose a proportional part.

Mr. MANN. Then the law could not be complied with.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that the department now has the authority to appropriate a sum of money for the purpose of establishing an experimental station at that point, but has declined to do so.

Mr. LAMB. I think my friend is mistaken. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas in regard to the committee being indifferent as to his bill and not acting upon it, the next day after he presented it to the committee I appointed a subcommittee and they had it under consideration. We did act upon it, and placed it in the hands of a subcommittee. We were not in a situation to create any new experimental station. We struggled hard to reduce the bill to the proper amount so that we thought it would receive the consideration and approval of the House. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas would mean taking so much away from some other State. This line of legislation must be taken up and considered by some future Congress, if at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that you have added a million dollars to this bill?

Mr. LAMB. No; about $800,000. That is on account of the increase in the work of the department as well as the creation of new laws which necessitated this increase.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his point of order and give Plainview this small sum of $50,000 for this experimental station.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, while that amendment and ruling applied to the State of Texas, I do not think it applies to California, and therefore I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That $25,000 of said sum shall be used for the purpose of establishing one of said stations at Dorris, Siskiyou County, Cal.

Mr. LAMB. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the erection of buildings, the preparation, illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other necessary expenses, $105,000, as follows: Alaska, $30,000; Hawaii, $30,000; Porto Rico, $30,000; and Guam, $15,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, and to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of said stations, and this fund shall be available until used.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. May I ask the gentleman how much money was received during the last fiscal year from the sale of products at these various farms?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I can not place my hand on the amount just now.

Mr. MANN. Here we are making an appropriation of $30,000 for the maintenance of a farm in Alaska, $30,000 for the maintenance of a farm in Hawaii, $30,000 for the maintenance of a farm in Porto Rico, and $15,000 for a farm in the island of Guam, and we are making those appropriations annually. Even a fancy kid farmer, a dress-suit farmer, could run a farm fairly well if he gets $30,000 annually in addition to the amount he realizes from the farm. He could run a farm that way and really have the champagne cost less than the milk. How much do they make on these farms? Do they turn the amount over again, if they get a bonus or subsidy of $15,000 a year for running a farm in Guam, where they do not raise anything to speak of except coconuts?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, my friend knows as well as I do that the proceeds from these farms are nil. This is an experiment to teach these people. It is a part of the program of the country to extend this work and educate the people in farming.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, taking my distinguished friend at his word that the farms are only for educational purposes, and the proceeds are nil, I make the point of order against the language on page 56, in lines 4, 5, and 6, as follows:

And to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of said stations.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that.

Mr. COX. What is the purpose of making that point of order?

Mr. MANN. Then if they receive any proceeds they will be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and we will ascertain at some time in reference to what they do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Illinois fear that this transfer of earnings from their own coffers to the Public Treasury will dislocate the finances?

Mr. LAMB. No; not at all. I could answer that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to make the point of order to the language on page 56, beginning on line 4:

And to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of said stations.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, what is to become of the language following:

And this fund shall be available until used.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that has been carried for years, and I think properly so, because these farms do not operate by the fiscal year. The appropriation is by the fiscal year, but unfortunately the farm is not managed on the basis of the fiscal year.

Mr. FOSTER. But they get so much appropriation each year.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but take the appropriation this year, for instance. They make their plans accordingly. It is current law. That appropriation would cease to be available on the 1st of July unless this language were in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. But another appropriation comes in at that time.

Mr. MANN. That is true; but they have made their plans on that appropriation, and this has been carried for years, so it is six of one and a half a dozen of the other.

Mr. FOSTER. If they do not use all their appropriation this gives it to them for other years.

Mr. LEVER. That is in keeping with the Hatch and other acts. They get $15,000 a year until used.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that in the case of Alaska, where the seasons are short and the crops have to be expedited if they are produced, conditions require that the appropriations shall go over.

I do not know how it is in that land of perpetual summer—Guam. I am not so certain about that; but I know that appropriations made in the military appropriation bill for work on roads and things of that kind in Alaska have to be made available for 15 months, otherwise they can not be used frequently.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague will understand the department has no authority in making its arrangements this spring in Alaska to assume that Congress is going to make an appropriation available after the 1st of July, and they are forbidden to assume that.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that. I think it is right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories as affecting irrigation and the rights of appropriators, and of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation, and upon the use of irrigation water at home and abroad, with especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture, and upon the use of different kinds of power and appliances for irrigation, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all necessary expenses, $108,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I want to call attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the language in line 8 in regard to an investigation of irrigation laws at home and abroad. Does the gentleman believe that that language is of any benefit there? How is it carried out? Do we actually send people abroad to investigate the irrigation laws of other countries?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know; I suppose we have sometimes. I do not see why they put "abroad" in there, unless at some time they send people to other countries.

Mr. COX. Is there any law now—I mean basic or organic law—which would empower the Agricultural Department to send representatives abroad for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of foreign laws upon the subject of irrigation?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know; I do not think so.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, on the language "at home and abroad."

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order—no, I do not; it has been carried heretofore; it has been carried all the time, and I do not think it would be if there is not some good reason for it, but I can not lay my hands on it now.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this has been in here for a good many years with a good deal of benefit. Now, I have not the statute before me to say whether or not this has been carried by act——

Mr. COX. I have no quarrel to make at all about the investigation at home, but it is about this investigation abroad.

Mr. RAKER. I am referring especially to abroad. You will observe from the works and pamphlets on irrigation relative to irrigation abroad that that has been done for 500 years, and there has been great use and benefit derived from it. It is one of the beneficial things, and it has given the department some of the ideas relative to their work here.

Mr. COX. Are not the laws obtainable at the Public Library without sending men abroad?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not an investigation of the laws, but an investigation of the use of the water.

Mr. COX. The language is, "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories," and so forth.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is only a part; the gentleman will read after that.

Mr. RAKER. "And upon the use of irrigation water at home and abroad."

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not an investigation of the laws abroad, but the use of irrigation water abroad—the systems of irrigation.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe that any representative of this country can go abroad and get facts so as to be able to tell our engineers how to handle irrigation projects?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and these older countries can give these people some lessons on how to irrigate, as they have been irrigating there for centuries.

Mr. COX. I think they are making wonderful progress in this country, and I make the point of order on that language "and abroad." I do not want to cripple the service——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands which may be made available for agricultural purposes, and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage from such lands, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all necessary expenses, $97,000.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 56, just passed. It is in line 17——

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what it is for.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman it is for the purpose of asking that provision be made for having the information at the disposal of the Agriculture Department put in the form of courses equivalent to correspondence courses, as well as in the form of bulletins, so that it can be sent to the teachers in the public schools through the agency of the Office of Experiment Stations; and I would like to read, if there is no objection and the gentleman will reserve the point of order, what is said about it——

Mr. FOSTER. The department now issues these bulletins of investigations of nutrition.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to return for the purpose of offering an amendment or for discussing it?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment which the gentleman desires to offer?

Mr. HOBSON. It is not for nutrition, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], but the paragraph before that. It is to change $23,000 to $33,000, to enable the Office of Experiment Stations to have two experts, with a limited additional clerical force, under which they estimate. They could then proceed with their existing machinery to have the experiment stations and the State agricultural colleges and State superintendents and county superintendents of education to reach the teachers in the rural schools——

Mr. MANN. I object, unless the gentleman will state what his amendment is.

Mr. HOBSON. It is to strike out $23,000 and insert $33,000.

Mr. MANN. Is that all the amendment?

Mr. HOBSON. That is all the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to return to page 56 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment as indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would like to insert the letter of the chief of the bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] extending his remarks in the manner indicated?

There was no objection.

The following is the letter referred to:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF EXPERIMENT STATIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1913.

HON. RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request upon Mr. Crosby at the conference in your office this morning, we have considered the question of extending the agricultural education work of the office so as to reach the teachers in public schools, and have come to the conclusion that no change is needed in the language of the appropriation bill as contained in the paragraph beginning with line 7 and ending with line 17, page 56, H. R. 28283, to enable the office to cooperate with the agricultural colleges and other State educational forces in preparing and disseminating material on agricultural subjects to be used in correspondence courses or reading courses for teachers in the public schools.

As Mr. Crosby explained to you this morning, we have already prepared quite a number of bulletins especially for the use of teachers, and it is our hope not only to add materially to the number of these publications but also to issue publications for teachers at frequent, regular intervals, so as to have a medium through which we can communicate with them regularly and frequently concerning the progress of agricultural education and the development of better methods of teaching.

In order to inaugurate this work and to put ourselves in a position to cooperate with the State agricultural colleges, as suggested above, we estimate that it would require the services of at least two additional experts, trained not only in the science of agriculture but also in pedagogy and the methods of the schoolroom. To secure the services of two such men, whose qualifications would command the respect of educators throughout the country, and to supply them with the necessary clerical help, office facilities, and means for a limited amount of travel, would require an addition of about $10,000 to the item in line 17 on page 56 of the appropriation bill referred to above.

I wish to thank you for the interest you have taken in this matter, because we think of the work in the rural public schools as being fundamental to the permanent advancement of agriculture, and, more important than that, to the advancement of the people living in the country and depending upon the land for subsistence and the means of educational and social development.

Very respectfully, yours, A. C. TRUE, Director.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the matter that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] just referred to, I should have supposed that that could be taken care of under the Lever bill when that becomes a law, as I hope it will. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill in reference to whether he has any information concerning the report that was ordered to be made at the beginning of this session of Congress upon the feasibility and economy of irrigation by the reservoir system in western Kansas and Oklahoma?

Mr. LAMB. I have not.

Mr. MANN. We carried an item in the bill last year requiring the Secretary to make a report at the opening of the "next session," which is this session, on that subject, and I await with anxiety a report from some of the gentlemen from western Kansas or Oklahoma in reference to this matter. They were very urgent last year to have the item inserted in the bill, and ought to be here to give us the information as to what is the result of that investigation.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say I have not the information.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We do not need it down in the southeastern part of the State, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Salaries, Office of Public Roads: One director, who shall be a scientist and have charge of all scientific and technical work, $4,000; 1 chief clerk, $1,900; 1 clerk, class 4; 2 clerks, class 3; 1 clerk, $1,500; 1 clerk, $1,440; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,440; 1 clerk, $1,380; 2 clerks, at $1,320 each; 4 clerks, at $1,260 each; 3 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,200; 1 clerk or photographer, $1,000; 2 clerks, at $1,140 each; 1 clerk, $1,080; 1 clerk, $1,020; 4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $900; 1 clerk or instrument maker, $1,200; 1 messenger or laboratory helper, $840; 2 messengers, laborers, or laboratory helpers, at $720 each; 1 messenger or laborer, $660; 4 messengers, laborers, or messenger boys, at $600 each; 2 messenger boys, at $480 each; 2 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $47,400.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask one of the gentlemen in charge of the bill just what all this clerical force in the Good Roads Bureau in the Department of Agriculture does for a living?

Mr. LAMB. Will the gentleman state that again?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask what this clerical force in the Good Roads Bureau of the Department of Agriculture does for a living.

Mr. LAMB. They work on the experimental part of good-road making. Here is what the chief of the bureau says:

At the last session of Congress an appropriation of $500,000 was passed in the Post Office bill for public roads in connection with the rural free delivery of mail, the States and local subdivisions to cooperate and apportion twice the amount. As there is no provision in the appropriation of $500,000 carried in the Post Office bill for clerical services in Washington, it will be necessary to materially increase the clerical force provided for public roads in the agricultural bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Everybody knows that there has been no part of this $500,000 expended. Everybody knows that no part of the $500,000 could be expended, and everybody ought to know, if they do not, that there is no reason why a large force of high-priced clerks should be added to the Good Roads Bureau of the Department of Agriculture just because it happened that $500,000 was appropriated to be used through the Post Office Department in the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States in the construction of good roads.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. The total amount of money appropriated for the Good Roads Bureau in this bill is $274,000. The total amount of money expended for clerical force is $47,400—20 per cent of the whole appropriation expended for salaries.

Mr. LAMB. This whole thing is for salaries, my friend. The whole business down there is salaries, or 90 per cent, anyway.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is all salaries, then it is of no use. If we do not do any practical work for the money we appropriate, except to pay salaries, we accomplish no purpose.

Mr. LAMB. How do you know they are accomplishing no purpose, my dear fellow?

Mr. MADDEN. I am just telling you that they are accomplishing no purpose. The supposition is that this bureau is to expend a part of the appropriation in the construction of sample roads. But the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture says that it is all salaries.

Mr. LAMB. A great portion of it is for salaries. I do not mean by that that every dollar is expended in that way.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see why you should expect any practical results if nothing more practical than drawing salaries is done.

Mr. LAMB. I will say very frankly in answer to your first inquiry as to the $500,000, which, perhaps, has not been utilized, as we know, the work necessitates a great correspondence. I suppose hundreds of thousands of letters would not be an exaggeration of the amount that they are receiving. You have received a great many, I think, yourself as to this very bill. I know I have.

Now, that is only one of the reasons he gives here for asking an increase. I want to say that we did not allow half of what he asked for, both as to newer places and as to money.

Now, as to what the results are—and that is what the gentleman wants and what we all want—this good-roads proposition is educational. The officer in charge of that bureau ascertains what material will make good roads. He sends that information to the people in the States in pamphlets. He has hundreds, and I might say thousands, of letters every day to answer, and he is doing all the work he can do and the best work he can do, and we are trying to confine it to experimental and instruction work alone.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that there is a joint commission of the House and Senate now considering the question of cooperation with the States in the matter of road building, and I know of no reason on earth why any addition should be made to the force of the Bureau of Good Roads in the Department of Agriculture until there is some intention manifested by Congress to cooperate with the States in the construction of good roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he does not believe that at this time to considerably increase the cost and expenses of bureaucracy can not but have an injurious effect on the good-roads movement, in which the people are now all very much interested? I want to ask him whether or not one of the fears that have been expressed by some of those who oppose roads legislation has not been that it might lead to a very extensive and expensive bureaucracy here at the seat of the Federal Government, and whether he does not think that if we were now to commence building up the bureau with additional help and additional expenditure it would have a serious detrimental effect upon the cause of good roads, which many of us are now trying to promote?

Mr. MADDEN. I certainly do, Mr. Chairman. I believe this, that, to begin with, the construction of roads ought to be left to the jurisdiction of the States. I believe the Federal Government, if it should cooperate at all with the States, should cooperate with them in the construction of good roads initiated by the States; and whatever may be the percentage of the cost of those roads, either for construction or maintenance, or both, as may be decided upon by the Congress as wise for the Government's share, should be turned over to the States only after legislation has been enacted by the States and by the Congress, so that there will be no bureaucratic government in the management of the roads to be constructed throughout the United States.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. The question I desire to ask is simply to bring to the attention of the gentleman the interstate character of highways, and to ask if the gentleman does not approve the principle of the Federal Government coordinating and cooperating where such highways overlap from State to State, and in order to do that does he not think the Government, with its facilities, should establish and maintain what would be the equivalent of a survey for such roads, a highway survey, through this bureau or some other bureau?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I believe if the Government of the United States is to cooperate with the States in the construction of good roads, the Congress should enact a fundamental law which should operate automatically, which would offer to the various States of the Union a certain percentage of the cost of any roads that might be constructed by the States when those roads are approved by the Government of the United States, and that any State desiring to come in under the provisions of the Federal law should be required to make uniform provisions for the construction of roads, as provided in the fundamental act passed by the Congress.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that at this stage in the development of the good-roads question a large increase should be made in this bureau in the Department of Agriculture, because if the Congress finally does enact a law under which cooperation with the States shall become a fact, this matter of road construction and cooperation should be left with the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department has jurisdiction over the rural-mail routes of the country, and this institution is the proper institution to take jurisdiction of the subject.

And whether it be through the bureau that is now in existence in the Agricultural Department or through some other machinery, I am not in favor at the present time of increasing the number of men to be employed in this bureau.

Mr. COX. The gentleman propounded some interrogatories a moment ago of the gentleman in charge of the bill, making an inquiry as to what these clerks do.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will take the estimates, he will find that of the total of $272,400 estimated for 1914 the amount of $85,000 is estimated for traveling expenses.

Mr. MADDEN. That shows the extravagant way in which money is appropriated for this purpose. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. I renew my motion, and make it 5 minutes instead of 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] make a motion to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, strike out the paragraph included between lines 1 and 17.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out this provision, which is in the interest of the building of good roads, will not prevail nor, indeed, be seriously considered.

Mr. WILLIS. It will not be.

Mr. CANDLER. Because of the fact that there is nothing to-day that is interesting the American people more than the construction of good roads, and the result shows that there is nothing which accomplishes more good than the money expended in the construction of good roads. These clerks in this bureau are used for the purpose of cooperating with the various States throughout this Union in reference to this great question.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANDLER. Why, with pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know any place where this bureau has ever started a road that has been finished, or does he know any place in Mississippi, for example, where any advantages have been gained by the expenditure of this vast sum of money by this Bureau of Good Roads in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. CANDLER. Not only in Mississippi, but throughout the country they have constructed object-lesson roads in almost all the States. These object-lesson roads have brought about marvelous results, because they have been taken as patterns from which other roads have been constructed. That is true not only in Mississippi, but in other States. We were down in the great State of South Carolina the other day——

Mr MADDEN. Where, for instance, in the State of Mississippi?

Mr. CANDLER. They have constructed sand-clay roads in a great many places.

Mr. MADDEN. Where?

Mr. CANDLER. I stated in South Carolina; and they have been built elsewhere, for that matter. These clerks in this bureau are used in cooperation with the work of the several States, and in 1911 the States of this Union expended or authorized the expenditure of $141,298,209 for the construction of good roads. My own State of Mississippi authorized an expenditure of $2,627,500.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but what has that to do with this bureau?

Mr. CANDLER. This bureau cooperates with the States.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, nonsense. They do not cooperate with them at all.

Mr. CANDLER. In that statement the gentleman is mistaken. The department sends these representatives of this Bureau of Good Roads throughout the country to confer with local authorities in reference to road material and to advise and consult with the State and local authorities in reference to the construction of good roads.

Mr. MADDEN. Not once has any representative of the Bureau of Good Roads communicated directly with anybody in Illinois concerning the expenditure of any money by the State, or any political subdivision of it.

Mr. CANDLER. Probably the gentleman has not asked for any cooperation.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not need them. We know more than they do about it.

Mr. CANDLER. If you had asked them, they would have been very glad to help you, as they have helped the people in other States. Of course, if you know more than they do, you do not need them and ought not to have them.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not want the help of people who do not know as much about it as we do.

Mr. CANDLER. Those who are so wise as not to need help ought not to have it; and the reason you did not get it is because you thought yourselves wise and therefore did not ask for aid; you did not want it, and it was not forced upon you. Sometimes there is no greater folly than to believe ourselves so wise as to refuse information when offered to us or to fail to avail ourselves of it when it is at our command. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Did not some one make the statement a moment ago that $70,000 or $80,000 or $90,000 was used for traveling expenses?

Mr. COX. I said the Book of Estimates for 1914 estimated $85,072 for traveling expenses.

Mr. MANN. That includes other items, because the amount expended for traveling expenses in the last fiscal year was only $7,000.

Mr. CANDLER. When they send their engineers throughout the country it costs money; but I feel sure the gentleman from Indiana is incorrect and the gentleman from Illinois is nearer the mark.

Mr. MANN. The department makes a report of the actual traveling expenses paid, which report I hold in my hand.

Mr. COX. I do not know anything about it except the Book of Estimates. I get my figures directly from that.

Mr. CANDLER. The Book of Estimates is what it purports to be, "a book of estimates," and, hence, does not show actual expenditures. It shows only estimates proposed. Expenditures are money actually expended, which is a very different proposition.

In view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, I submit the following record of achievements in the past 16 years of the Office of Public Roads, which I have secured from an authentic source:

RECORD, OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS, FOR 16 YEARS.

During the past 16 years the Office of Public Roads has grown from a small organization, with an annual appropriation of $8,000 and employing 7 persons, to a thoroughly developed organization, with 165 permanent and temporary employees, and an annual appropriation of $202,120. There is also an appropriation for the current year of $500,000, made by Congress, to be expended under the direction of this department on post roads. It is provided that in order to avail themselves of this appropriation the States or localities interested shall contribute $2 for every $1 contributed by the National Government. The Department of Agriculture, through its Office of Public Roads, will thus direct the expenditure of $1,702,120 this year.

During the fiscal year 1896–97 the office directed the construction of 7 object-lesson experimental roads, while during 1911–12 there were built 31 object-lesson roads, involving 400,775 square yards of surfacing. From 1897 to 1912, inclusive, 343 object-lesson and experimental roads have been constructed. It has been found that object-lesson roads built under the direction of engineers from the office are a most effective method of carrying information concerning standard construction to the various localities. The cost of construction is borne by the localities in which roads are built. The number of roads built each year by the office from 1897 to 1912, inclusive, is as follows:

	Roads.
1897	7
1898	10
1899	4
1900	7
1901	14
1902	15
1903	8
1904	17
1905	21
1906	17
1907	16
1908	18
1909	57
1910	49
1911	52
1912	31
Total	343

The activities of the office reflect in a measure the progress and present condition of the road movement in the United States. Sixteen years ago only four States had passed State-aid laws and established State highway departments to direct the work, viz: New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and California. At the present time, however, the principle of State aid has been adopted in 40 States.

The Office of Public Roads was originally the Office of Road Inquiry in the Department of Agriculture, and was established under authority of an act of Congress of March 3, 1893, with an appropriation of $10,000. It was provided by law that the Secretary of Agriculture should make inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States, make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, prepare publications, and assist agricultural colleges and experiment stations to disseminate information concerning roads.

During three fiscal years the appropriation and the wording of the original bill remained the same. The appropriation, however, for the year 1897 was reduced to $8,000, and a provision was added authorizing the investigation of road-making materials in the several States. The appropriation remained $8,000 annually during the years 1898, 1899, and 1900, and no change was made in the wording of the bill, although the name of the office was changed from Office of Road Inquiry to Office of Public Road Inquiries in 1899.

The Agriculture bill for 1901 carried an appropriation of $14,000, and provided for conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere and for collecting, reporting, and illustrating results of such experiments. The appropriation for 1902 was $20,000, and the bill provided for an investigation of the chemical and physical characteristics of road materials.

In 1903 the appropriation was increased to $30,000, in 1904 to $35,000, in 1906 to $50,000, in 1907 to $70,000, in 1909 to $87,390, in 1910 to $116,460, in 1912 to $160,720, and in 1913 to $202,120, making in all a total for the Office of Public Roads, from 1897 to 1913, inclusive, of $1,039,150. The bill approved March 3, 1903, changed the name of the office from Office of Road Inquiries to Office of Public Roads and established a statutory organization.

For the fiscal year 1912 Congress appropriated $10,000 to conduct field experiments in various methods of road construction and maintenance and to investigate various road materials and preparations. This appropriation has enabled the office to conduct a series of independent experiments along comprehensive lines.

In December, 1900, a laboratory was established in the Bureau of Chemistry for the testing of road materials. This laboratory was transferred in 1905 to the Office of Public Roads, where its present organization has been developed and perfected. From 1900 to June 1, 1912, 6,060 samples of road materials have been tested, including rock, gravel, sand, slag, clay, brick, cement, iron, steel, asphalt, oil, tar, rubber, and various other substances.

Much has been accomplished in the development of the physical tests of rock for road building, and the methods here adopted are now practically standard throughout the United States.

Research work in concrete has been productive of promising results. The properties of oil-mixed Portland cement concrete have been investigated and indicate this material to be one of merit for damp-proofing purposes. A public patent has been granted for this material, so that anyone may now use it without the payment of royalties. Measurements of the expansion and contraction of concrete while hardening which are of value to concrete engineers have aroused considerable interest and serve to explain certain phenomena in connection with concrete construction.

Experiments have been conducted to determine the efficiency of oils, tars, asphalt, and other preparations used for the purpose of preventing dust and preserving macadam roads under modern traffic conditions. Laboratory experiments have been accompanied by service tests and experiments in the field. The office has also conducted investigations to determine the feasibility of building sand-clay and burnt-clay roads in the Southern States and in the Mississippi Valley. Such construction has been found to be practicable for certain regions where materials are available and climatic conditions favorable.

Successful efforts are constantly made to bring about a more general use of the split-log drag in the maintenance of earth and gravel roads.

In order to demonstrate the fundamental principles of road construction better, the office has built a number of models of various standard types of roads and bridges and of road-building equipment, including road machines, rollers, and crushers. A set of models was first exhibited at the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition. Since that exposition closed similar exhibits have been shown in many parts of the United States through the medium of expositions and by means of exhibit trains operated by various railroad companies. The cost of making such demonstrations has been paid by the exposition or by the railroad companies interested. Lecturers and demonstrators from the office have accompanied exhibits and made them, to a large degree, schools in road building.

Realizing the need for trained highway engineers, the office inaugurated a plan in the year 1905 whereby a number of graduates in engineering are appointed each year from engineering schools and colleges after competitive examinations. These men are given a thorough training in road building, while they also render practical service to the Government. An efficient corps of highway engineers is thus prepared to carry out road building along correct lines. A number of engineers from the office are already connected with State and county highway departments in various parts of the United States, while several of them are constantly retained in the Government service.

The office has investigated the decomposition of rock powders under the action of water and discovered important facts with reference to their use as road materials. Investigations into the corrosion of iron and steel culverts and fences have also been productive of important results, and the matter of protective coatings has been extensively studied.

In May, 1907, the office inaugurated a project designed to introduce improved standard systems of construction, maintenance, and administration of roads into various counties throughout the United States. Under this plan experienced engineers are assigned to make thorough investigations on all phases of the road work of various counties, and to prepare exhaustive reports with plans, estimates, and recommendations. This method has already resulted in saving thousands of dollars to the counties where such model systems have been adopted.

Thorough and systematic methods of organization have been introduced into the administration of the office. Each employee is given specific duties to perform, and a careful system of reports and records is kept of work done and expenditures made on every project. The most approved system of filing is in use, and a library has been established containing a complete collection of periodicals, manuscripts, pamphlets, reports, and books on all phases of road work. This library is being added to constantly. Seventy-two periodicals are now regularly received, of which 41 are donated.

The office has in its files 8,237 photographic negatives and about 5,000 lantern slides illustrating nearly every item of road improvement. These slides are extensively used by representatives of the office in lecture work. During the year just closed 1,135 lectures were delivered by representatives of the office, nearly all of which were illustrated with lantern slides.

From 1897 to the present time the office has issued 28 bulletins, 73 circulars, 10 farmers' bulletins, 19 yearbook extracts, 15 annual reports, and 1 lecture syllabus, a total of 146 publications.

Investigations are now under way to determine the economic benefits resulting from road improvement and the particular relation of such improvement to agriculture. It is evident that when $142,000,000 constitutes the annual expenditure for road purposes in this country improved business management in our road work is imperative. Much statistical work is therefore carried on, particularly on the subjects of mileage, cost, and financing. The method of financing road construction by bond issues is becoming very common and is receiving considerable attention from the office, with the view to giving appropriate information to those who contemplate such methods of road financing. In order that the office may be kept in close touch with road work a collaborator is employed in each State to act as representative and to correspond monthly with the office.

An investigation was begun in 1904 to ascertain the mileage of improved and unimproved roads, rates of levy, and sources of revenue in every county in the United States. This work was finished in June, 1907, and shows that there were then over 2,150,000 miles of roads in the United States, of which only 7.14 per cent were improved. The expenditure in money and labor for that year amounted to nearly $80,000,000. A similar investigation begun in 1909 shows that there were in that year 2,199,645 miles of public roads in the United States, of which 190,476 miles, or 8.66 per cent, were improved. Information in regard to expenditures on all the public roads in the United States was collected during the year 1911. This investigation shows that the expenditures for that year amounted to approximately $142,000,000.

The Office of Public Roads is alive to the present problems of highway development, and its efforts are constantly and systematically directed toward their solution. The normal development of the office during the past 16 years has placed it in such a position that it may now be called a clearing house for all road questions.

The following is the approximate road expenditures and bond issues authorized in the several States during the year 1911, which are the last available statistics on the subject.

TOTAL EXPENDITURES FOR THE YEAR 1911.

NOTE.—It is estimated that not over one-fourth of the amount shown in column 2 was expended during the year, and that about an equal sum derived from previous bond issues was expended, which makes the total estimated expenditure for the year 1911 $141,298,209.

Mr. Chairman, the above statistics demonstrate the interest in the subject of road building exhibited throughout the States. The Office of Public Roads has done a great work and accomplished great results with the amount of money which has been heretofore appropriated. I am greatly interested in the subject of good roads, and I believe that no money can be expended in a better way than to aid the people in the construction of good roads throughout the country. In this way benefit is derived not only in the distribution of money among the people, but no money expended brings greater material benefit to the people than the amount expended for the improvement of our public roads. It is estimated at the present time that the expense of transportation over the "dirt road" is 25 cents per ton per mile and that where the roads are improved it reduces this expense more than one-half. Statistics further show that the improvement of the roads increase the value of the land along these roads on an average of 25 to 50 per cent, and in some instances even more. It further benefits the people by giving them comfortable travel, which brings about closer association in the community and adds much to the comfort of rural life, and hence I earnestly favor the improvement of our public roads and hope the day may speedily come when this great Government will aid in this good work. [Applause.]

There is another provision in this Agriculture appropriation bill worthy of the highest consideration. It is as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm products, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere there is hereby appropriated the sum of $50,000.

Under the provision it is proposed to confer upon the Agricultural Department authority and power to investigate the subject of the marketing of farm products in the United States. At the present time there is too much difference in the value of farm products on the farm and to the producer and their cost on the table to the consumer. The statistics show that the crop for 1912 will yield to the producer $6,000,000,000, yet when these same crops reach the consumer they will have increased in cost to the enormous sum of $13,000,000,000. In other words, the producer gets $6,000,000,000 while the distributor gets $7,000,000,000, clearly showing that under the present system it is more profitable to distribute than to produce farm products. If the Government will take up the question of the distribution of farm products and deal with it with the same energy and enthusiasm as it has dealt with the production of farm products, the enormous waste now prevalent throughout the country will be turned into profit for the farmer and be added to the sum total of the Nation's wealth.

If this provision is enacted into law, it will bring the producer and consumer closer together and consequently reduce the difference between them now existing in the prices paid to the producer and the prices paid by the consumer, and the farmers will be furnished accurate information to enable them to find the best and the quickest market for their products. In the interest of the farmer and the producer in this great country I sincerely hope that this provision in this bill will become a law, and if it does it will contribute much to putting into the pockets of the farmers, who by their toil produce the products, their value and give to them the benefit of their labors, and in benefiting them aid the general prosperity of the whole country. I have often stated on the floor of this House, and I now repeat it, that when we help the farmers of this country we benefit and aid every other class of our citizenship, for at last it is upon the farmer that the prosperity and development of the country must stand; therefore help the farmers and thereby help everybody else in the country and thus bless and prosper all of our noble, liberty-loving, and patriotic citizenship. Let us as true servants of the people emblazon our banners with "America for Americans," and prosperity, if possible, for all our citizens. Give them help when we can and thus bless all our homes, the bulwark of American citizenship and free institutions. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. The total traveling expenses for the whole thing amounts to less than $6,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor; for the erection of buildings; such experimental work to be confined as nearly as possible to one point during the fiscal year, $45,000.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman if this appropriation of $45,000 is not a duplication of two other appropriations, particularly the one in lines 7 to 9, inclusive, "for the investigation of the best methods of road making and the best kind of road-making materials and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance"?

Mr. LAMB. I think not. This is an increase for conducting field experiments. One is information and the other is a test. This experiment work is of the greatest importance. They study the materials of different types for road construction, particularly those types calculated to eliminate the dust nuisance and provide a dustless road. Then it is extremely desirable to exercise some control and supervision over the roads after they are made in order to estimate the value and cost of the experiment. A large amount of this appropriation is to be used for the purchase of crude material.

Mr. BATHRICK. I wish to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to these various methods pursued in the Department of Agriculture to secure appropriations for the same purpose for larger amounts than they expect to get in one paragraph. This item might have been included under the same head with the $100,000 item in lines 7 to 9. It seems to be the same thing. It illustrates how the department has hitherto secured more money by these subterfuges in having appropriations made in different classes for the same purpose.

Mr. LAMB. I want to say to the gentleman that the Committee on Agriculture has carefully considered this particular part of the bill and endeavored to keep it down as low as possible. These appropriations we could not resist, as they are supported by public demand and public sentiment in this country for road improvement.

Mr. BATHRICK. I am not resisting the public demand or public sentiment, but I say that here are two items that could be well placed under the same head. It is quite apparent that it is a scheme to increase appropriations and escape the notice of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the insecticide act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act of April 26, 1910, entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded Paris greens, lead arsenates, and other insecticides, and also fungicides, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," in the city of Washington and elsewhere, including chemical apparatus, chemicals, and supplies, repairs to apparatus, gas, electric current, official traveling expenses, telegraph and telephone service, express and freight charges, and all other expenses, employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as may be considered necessary for the purposes named, $95,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This item when inserted in the bill was inserted on the floor of the House. It does not belong under the head of "Miscellaneous"; it is for ordinary work of the department, and ought to be inserted ahead of "Miscellaneous," because it is permanent law and the permanent policy of the Government.

Mr. LEVER. I think the gentleman from Illinois is right, and we will take care of it next time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, there is another suggestion that I think might well be made, and that is that when it is made permanent law it ought not to be carried year after year in a lump sum, as it is here, but that these different salaries should be segregated.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my colleague that it is a little difficult to do that. They have not yet reached the point where they could segregate the operation under the pure-food law.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought that in one year they might be able to do it. A lump-sum appropriation is not a good appropriation to make if it can be made the other way.

Mr. MANN. It is not all expended under the Chemical Bureau, but it is expended in the Bureau of Animal Industry and, it may be, one or two other bureaus. It is apportioned by the Secretary.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; it goes to salaries of inspectors and others. I think both suggestions, however, are good.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what has been done to carry out the provisions of this act? I feel somewhat interested, because I reported the bill out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. LAMB. I can not go into the details of it, for I do not know, except that it is under the charge of the Secretary, and he is given a broad authority here to exercise his discretion.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is there anything in the hearings as to what has been done?

Mr. LAMB. I do not recall that there is.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, a very large appropriation—$95,000—is asked for without any information at all as to whether anything has been done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there has been very little done under this paragraph in the current law up to date, except in reference to the Mediterranean fly and its importation from Hawaii into the United States. There is quite a full explanation relating to this item in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for this year.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, in addition to that, permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we have the statement of Dr. Haywood, taken before the committee, who is in charge of the enforcement of this act, and he tells us in substance that the principal part of his work heretofore has been the organization of his work—gathering together the force with which to enforce the act—and if we had the time I would be very glad to read from his statement just what he has done.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, my attention is called to the fact that in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year 1912 there are two references to this act, and if there is no objection I will ask to have them inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman cares, he can insert the statement of Dr. Haywood.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that the reference I made a moment ago to the Mediterranean fly does not apply to this provision of the appropriation at all. That is another matter. The department, however, has made a number of investigations along the same line as pure-food investigations under this item, and the result has been that Paris green and other insecticides can now be purchased in the market, in the main, quite safely, whereas before this law went into effect the chances were that the farmer who purchased an insecticide of that character purchased something that was worse than useless to him. It might have no strength, or if, perchance, it had strength it was usually so strong that if the farmer followed the formula he would destroy his trees instead of protecting them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, was permission granted to insert these extracts from the report?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The references referred to are as follows:

INSECTICIDE ACT.

The first apparent violation of the insecticide act of 1910 was reported for prosecution in December, 1911. In all, 58 cases under this statute were reported during the year. Six of these cases resulted in convictions, and in one a decree of condemnation and forfeiture was entered. The goods in the latter case were subsequently released to the claimants under bond after payment of the costs. The Insecticide and Fungicide Board has completed its organization for obtaining evidence of violations of this statute.

INSECTICIDE INVESTIGATIONS.

The chemical examination of insecticides and fungicides has been a potent factor in improving the purity of products now sold on the market. Some idea of the value of such work to the farmer is gained by consideration of the loss occasioned by the ravages of plant diseases and insects. Experts have estimated that there is a loss of 20 per cent from these two sources, which, when applied to the farm crops of 1911, valued at $5,367,000,000, would indicate a loss of about $1,000,000,000. Probably one-third of this enormous sum could be saved by the proper application of insecticides and fungicides of the requisite strength and purity. Any inferiority in the quality of these materials means the additional loss of the labor in applying them.

The early studies of this subject showed that many of the insecticides on the market were of practically no value whatever, owing to the fact that they contained little or no active ingredients. Other insecticides which contained some active ingredients were adulterated by the addition of inert substances for the purpose of increasing the bulk to such an extent that they were of no value whatever.

As a result of the data secured by these investigations an insecticide and fungicide law was passed and approved April 26, 1910, which has greatly improved the conditions. Now it is a violation of law to ship in interstate commerce for sale any insecticide or fungicide which is adulterated or misbranded in any particular. A farmer in buying a supply to protect his crops can be reasonably sure he is getting exactly what he asks for and what he pays for. The insecticide laboratory of this bureau does a large part of the analytical work on the samples collected for the enforcement of the law. This laboratory, which conducted the investigations previous to the enactment of the law, did valuable pioneer work in developing methods for the analysis of these products. No methods of analysis had ever been worked out for many of the insecticides.

STATEMENT OF DR. J. K. HAYWOOD, CHAIRMAN OF THE INSECTICIDE AND FUNGICIDE BOARD.

Dr. HAYWOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I presume I had best start by telling you the reason for asking for an increase of $13,000 in the appropriation this year; that is, an increase from $87,000 to $100,000. The insecticide act of 1910 is, I believe, the most important act to the farming community now being enforced; it directly applies to the farmers of the country, because it is for the purpose of having pure insecticides and pure fungicides. Now, it has been estimated, and estimated on conservative figures, that the annual damage in this country from insect pests is over a billion dollars, the exact figures being about $1,152,000,000. Over half of these insect pests and diseases caused by fungi can be controlled by means of insecticides and fungicides. So you at once see how important it is to the farmer that these should be pure and up to standard. I think that this law more directly applies to the farmer and is of greater benefit to him than even the food and drugs act, because he has here something that actually saves him dollars and many dollars each year if his insecticides and fungicides are pure. In the case of the food and drugs act he is not protected very much by that, because he grows most of his food himself and does not have to be protected against the illegitimate manufacturer of foods. Now, in enforcing this law we have found, up to the present time, that it will take all of the appropriation that we have, and by the end of the year we will be spending at the rate of the total appropriation; that is, we will have claims against it that will cover the whole $87,000 for next year, and we need an increase for next year.

We only have three inspectors traveling around the United States collecting samples of insecticides and fungicides, so that we may test them in the laboratory and in the field to find out whether they are true to name and whether they are adulterated or misbranded, and we badly need a fourth inspector and the necessary scientists to examine the samples collected by such inspector. We can cover three sections of the country, and we need to cover a fourth section of the country. You see, we have the far West, the Middle West, the South, and East, and we need another inspector to cover one of those sections, and that is the reason why we ask for an increase of $13,000.

You will perhaps be interested in knowing just a few of the adulterations and misbrandings that would cause no end of trouble if allowed to go on. In the case of lead arsenates, for example, in the United States there are several hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of lead arsenates sold each year, and it is very common to find excessive soluble arsenic in these lead arsenates. Soluble arsenic means the spolling of a tree if sprayed upon it; it defoliates and the fruit is spolled. It may even kill the tree. Such a sample of lead arsenate means that the farmer, instead of protecting his crop against insects, is ruining his crop. We have many cases of short weight, which I think is about the lowest form of deception that a man can practice. We have just seized two carloads of Paris green, which, instead of weighing 1 pound, as claimed on the label, weighed about nine-tenths of a pound.

Of course, that one-tenth of a pound did not mean very much on a single package, but on a total output it amounts to a great deal of gain for the manufacturer and a great deal of loss for the farming community. We constantly run across lice powders for poultry which consist of more than 50 per cent of road dust. A man has the right to put road dust in his insect powder, if he desires to do so, but our law makes him say that he has put it in, and under such circumstances the consumer knows exactly what he gets, i. e., that he is getting 50 per cent of road dust and 50 per cent of materials that are really of some value to him. Another very common form of adulteration is to adulterate with water. Take, for example, the lead arsenates on the market. They come in paste form, and the law allows 50 per cent of water in the lead arsenates, because that is the best form in which to give them to the farmers in that they can be stirred up easier for spraying purposes, but we have come across cases where we have found 60, 70, and even 80 per cent of water present. You can at once see that in such a case as this the farmer is paying for water at the price of lead arsenate. We have gone very slowly about the enforcement of this act; we wanted to be sure of our ground as we went along. It was a new act, and we have not appointed men rapidly, but have appointed them just as they were needed. At the present time, to take care of the samples that are being collected by inspectors, it is going to be necessary for us to appoint more scientists to make examinations of the samples, and that will be taken care of by the $87,000 appropriation; but to appoint a new inspector, which we need badly, that means the appointment of more scientists to examine the extra samples collected by the new inspector, and we can not take care of the United States certainly with less than four inspectors.

Mr. LEVER. What salaries do you pay the inspectors?

Dr. HAYWOOD. They get $1,400 a year and their expenses when traveling.

Mr. LEVER. Their expenses for traveling amount to about their salaries?

Dr. HAYWOOD. I should say that certainly their traveling expenses would equal their salaries, and by the time that they have purchased samples, the amount used by each inspector is considerably more than his salary. You see, they have to purchase all of the samples of insecticides and fungicides and pay for them out of this fund. There is nothing in the law that compels the dealer to give us a sample for nothing, and we have to purchase them. Some of them are quite expensive, and it means that usually an inspector costs us about $3,000 a year, in addition to his salary; that is, to purchase the samples, to pay traveling expenses, etc.

Mr. WHITACRE. Do you examine samples sent to you by individual farmers?

Dr. HAYWOOD. No, sir; because in order to prove a case under this insecticide act of 1910 we have to have the record showing interstate shipment and other facts in connection therewith, and we find that nobody except our inspectors, or somebody trained in that line of work, can give us the data necessary to show in court that an interstate shipment of the goods has been made.

Mr. WHITACRE. That is, if I buy a keg of lead arsenate and take out of it a can and send it to you, you would not tell me whether it was good or not?

Dr. HAYWOOD. No, sir.

Mr. WHITACRE. Then what good is that to me as a farmer?

Dr. HAYWOOD. The good to you is that we have improved and are improving straight along the lead arsenates and other insecticides that come on the market and the farmer is protected from buying lead arsenates that are not good, and the dishonest manufacturer is afraid to send out samples of lead arsenate that are adulterated or misbranded. He is afraid to send out such goods because he knows our inspectors are scouring the country for adulterated or misbranded insecticides or fungicides, and whenever we find that a manufacturer has sent out one that is adulterated or misbranded into interstate commerce, then the fact is reported to the Secretary of Agriculture, he refers it to the Department of Justice, and the man is prosecuted under the law, being given a fine. As soon as the courts have passed upon the matter the whole matter is published and sent all over the United States. The consequence is the manufacturers do not desire to pay the fines and do not desire the notoriety of their products being shown to be adulterated and misbranded, because it hurts the sale of them, and competitors use that against them. Therefore they prefer to send out pure insecticides and fungicides.

Mr. HOWELL. How many prosecutions have you instituted for violation of this act?

Dr. HAYWOOD. I have the figures here exactly, I think. We have referred to the Department of Justice for prosecution 101 cases, or perhaps I had better read the total number that we have collected. There are now undergoing examination in the various bureaus interested in this work 524 samples; we have placed 257 samples in permanent abeyance. That means that the samples were either found not adulterated or misbranded or that the adulteration or misbranding was not flagrant, that it was just technical in nature, and that we took it up by correspondence with the manufacturer in place of prosecuting him. We have referred to the Department of Justice for prosecution 101 cases; there are held in temporary abeyance, pending further information in the cases, 57; there are pending and awaiting hearing, after citation, 78; that means they have not been finally acted upon, but that the manufacturers have been cited and told their products were adulterated or misbranded, and we have notified them that if they have anything to say in regard to the findings—that is, that they were unjust—that they will be given an opportunity to be heard. And if they show that the findings are wrong we will not prosecute them, but if they can not show that the case then goes on to prosecution. Then we have referred to the Solicitor of the department 69 cases, making a total of 1,088 cases, out of which 101 have been sent to the Department of Justice for prosecution and 15 have been considered by the courts; and the decisions have been favorable to the department's contention in every case.

Mr. WHITACRE. Do you publish a list of those concerns whose products are found to be adulterated or misbranded?

Dr. HAYWOOD. No; we do not feel that we should publish a list of manufacturers whose products are, in our opinion, adulterated or misbranded unless the courts have decided that they are adulterated or misbranded. We may be wrong in our contention, and the courts are the ones to pass upon it. However, as soon as the courts have passed upon it and decided that we are right in our contention that the product is adulterated or misbranded, then it is published in the form of a notice of judgment, and these notices of judgment are sent broadcast and to anybody who asks for them.

Mr. RUBEY. How many cases have you had in which the courts rendered decisions?

Dr. HAYWOOD. Fifteen have been decided, and every one in favor of the Government.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Bureau of Chemistry has a number of inspectors doing practically the same thing that you inspectors do. Do you cooperate with the Bureau of Chemistry in this work, because, it seems to me, the work is similar?

Dr. HAYWOOD. Yes; this work is being done in cooperation with the Bureau of Chemistry to a large extent. I will explain the formation of the board. The board consists of a member of the Bureau of Chemistry, a member of the Bureau of Plant Industry, a member of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and a member of the Bureau of Entomology. They work without additional compensation; that is, do this work in addition to their regular duties. All of the chemical examinations of what are termed "dips," and things of that character, are made in the Bureau of Animal Industry by the chemist or bacteriologist and paid for from board funds; in the same way the Bureau of Chemistry examines all insecticides and fungicides except dips, and the chemists necessary to do that work are paid from the board funds. In the Bureau of Entomology there are certain entomologists who test these goods and see if they will perform what are claimed for them on the labels, and in the Bureau of Plant Industry they do that same thing; that is, they do for fungi what the entomologists do for insecticides—all of these people being paid from board funds. However, they do their work in the four bureaus involved and do it in quarters furnished by those four bureaus. When the law first went into effect it was our idea that we could probably get along without any inspectors, so the Secretary of Agriculture wrote to each one of the four bureaus involved and said, "Have your field agents collect samples for the insecticide and fungicide board." It was a failure for the following reasons, I suppose: The men in the field felt that they had their regular duties to attend to and that it took all of their time to attend to such duties; therefore the insecticide and fungicide work was put aside as a purely secondary consideration in every case.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, this made it as much their duty as any other duty that had been assigned to them, and it was natural to assume that they would perform one duty as well as they would any other duty.

Dr. HAYWOOD. The only way in which I can answer that question is that if a man is a food and drugs inspector, we will say, he has as much work as he can do as a food and drugs inspector, and it is only natural for him when it comes to neglecting anything, if he is obliged to neglect anything, to neglect the insecticide and fungicide work, in which he is not so directly interested. So we found, in the practical working out of the scheme, that we had to appoint these inspectors, and have only appointed three up to the present date, and those three inspectors have in the time that they have been appointed, which has been, well, I should say certainly less than a year, collected more insecticide and fungicide samples and have done more toward cleaning the market of adulterated and misbranded insecticides and fungicides than all of the inspectors of the bureaus together, and they consist of some 100 men.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no doubt they have done good work, but if the work could be done by these other inspectors, thereby saving this expense to the Government, they ought to do it.

Dr. HAYWOOD. I think it ought to be done, if it could be done, but the field agents of the various bureaus have as much as they can attend to in their own line of work, and I do not suppose they feel they can take up such an extra line of work, which makes more work than they can perform. I was talking to the chief food and drugs inspector about it a short time ago, and he said his men were doing as much work as they could do along their own line, and that he needed a good many more inspectors, and that they could only take up this as a secondary consideration. If it is a secondary consideration, that always means that the work is not done.

Mr. TALCOTT. And the adulteration and misbranding of these insecticides and fungicides leads to the loss of many dollars?

Dr. HAYWOOD. It leads to the loss of millions of dollars to the farmer. Before this law went into effect it was the most common thing in the world to find a lead arsenate that had enough soluble arsenic in it to absolutely ruin a whole orchard on which it was sprayed. It was the most common thing to find a lice powder with 80 per cent of road dust in it. These conditions we have improved; that is, the market has greatly improved in regard to adulterated and misbranded insecticides and fungicides, and, not only that, but we have improved the conditions at the factories. The head selling agent of one of the large insecticide manufacturing companies said to me the other day, "Well, you have caught us two or three times, but I thank the Lord you did, because it means that now they will put on enough chemists in our factory to see that these things come out right." He said that before this time his company would not incur the expense of putting on additional chemists, but now they had added three or four chemists to their staff to see that these insecticides came out unadulterated in any way.

Mr. TALCOTT. Then it was not always due to fraudulent intentions but to careless methods?

Dr. HAYWOOD. A great deal of it was due to careless methods of manufacture, but due to intention when you had 80 per cent of road dust in a lice powder, or if you took Persian insect powder, and instead of using flower heads of pyrethrum to make the insecticide, you took 80 per cent of the stems of that plant and ground it in with the heads so that you could not tell whether it was all heads or all stems, then you could not attribute it to anything else but fraudulent intentions.

Mr. TALCOTT. But by analysis you could ascertain that fact?

Dr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything else you wish to say?

Dr HAYWOOD. I do not think of anything else.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fighting and preventing forest fires in emergency: For fighting and preventing forest fires in cases of extraordinary emergency, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendments. There are two of them applying to the same subject, and I would like to have them both read and pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, both amendments will be read and considered pending at this time.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, page 61, insert in place of "$200,000," "$400,000."

After the word "necessary," in line 9, page 61, insert the following: "Provided, That not to exceed $200,000 shall be used for preventing forest fires in those States which appropriate a similar amount for the same purpose, and which have organized a fire-protection system which meets the approval of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the last amendment, or I will reserve it, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to move to strike out this paragraph, and I want to know when such a motion will be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order first to perfect the paragraph, and then a motion to strike out would be in order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in increasing the appropriation provided in this paragraph is to renew an appropriation that was included in what was known as the Appalachian forestry bill. This proposed appropriation, as I understand it, is for emergency purposes on the public lands. The appropriation to which I refer was made for general fire purposes in the various States throughout the Union, and it had attached to it the proviso that money should only be expended in those States which appropriated the same amount for the same purpose. I am informed that the appropriation of $200,000 which was made for that purpose is practically exhausted, and also that the results obtained from that appropriation of $200,000 have been the means of saving tens of millions of dollars of forests in the various States.

I doubt if any appropriation made in recent times has brought a better result than the $200,000 appropriated in the Appalachian bill, and the appropriation should be continued not only in this bill but in all successive appropriation bills providing for the Agriculture Department.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How was that $200,000 expended and to whom was it paid by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. It has been expended through the fire-control systems established by the States, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but what States got the money?

Mr. WEEKS. There were some 12 or 15 States which received a portion of the money.

Mr. MANN. I know, but can the gentleman tell us what States got the money?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not recall all of them. I know Minnesota, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Vermont, and several other States did; but I do not remember all of them.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, when the gentleman says this money has done more good than any other money appropriated, he or somebody else ought to be able to tell us what States got the money and how much and what was done with it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, the reason I have not these statistics at hand is because I had in mind that the $200,000 carried in this bill was to renew the appropriation which I desire made until I came into the House to-day, and for that reason I have not the statistics at hand.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. On page 34, lines 21 and 22 is an item—

For fighting and preventing forest fires and for other unforeseen emergencies, $150,000.

It seems the same language is included in this paragraph, but $200,000 is added. This is for the same purpose.

Mr. WEEKS. I shall have to ask the gentleman to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill for an answer to that inquiry.

Mr. BATHRICK. The word "emergencies" is used in the item on page 34 and "emergency" on page 61.

Mr. LAMB. All of this amount is to be used as an emergency fund, and that is held in the Treasury, subject to the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, in case there is an outbreak of fire, an unusual outbreak of fire. Last year only $22,700 of this $200,000 was used at all.

Mr. BATHRICK. In other words, you have a surplus of $178,000.

Mr. LAMB. Surely.

Mr. BATHRICK. Here is a $200,000 proposition in an emergency fund.

Mr. LAMB. Yes; the same appropriation as last year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the fact, that for the first appropriation in the bill of $150,000, it is proposed to be used in the main for preventing forest fires held for an extraordinary emergency and the other carried under miscellaneous is not supposed to be used, except for the purpose of fighting forest fires?

Mr. BATHRICK. Why, the word "preventing" is used in both these items.

Mr. MANN. I understand that is to avoid trouble with the comptroller because, sometimes in fighting forest fires, you have to use preventive measures in advance of where the fire is to head off the fire, and while that has been the purpose that course has been observed up to date by the department.

Mr. LAMB. I will say to the gentleman that this emergency fund was $1,000,000 previous to the past year, and we reduced it to $200,000, thinking this would be sufficient, and it has proven to be so.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman favor the amendment of appropriating $200,000 more?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to have a couple of minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEEKS. I thought the chairman of the committee wished to ask me a question.

Mr. LAMB. No.

Mr. WEEKS. Then I do not desire the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to strike out $200,000 and substitute $400,000.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the next amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio if he wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. BATHRICK. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not desire to do so now.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the continuous spread of the chestnut-bark disease by continuing the study of the nature and habits of the parasitic fungus causing the disease, for the purpose of discovering new methods of control, and by putting into application methods of control already discovered, $80,000, and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend said appropriation in such manner as he shall deem best, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned or with individuals, and to pay all necessary expenses for the employment of investigators, local and special agents, experts, assistants, and all labor and other necessary expenses, including rent, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as may be required: Provided, That of this sum not exceeding $10,000 shall be used in the study of the relation of insects to the chestnut-bark disease.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee how extensive this chestnut-bark disease is and what classes of trees it attacks and affects?

Mr. LAMB. It has extended all through certain portions of Pennsylvania and all of West Virginia—nearly everywhere the chestnut is—and has destroyed very much, practically all, in Virginia and a great deal in New York, I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. Does it affect any tree except the chestnut?

Mr. LAMB. I do not know. I suppose it does, though.

Mr. MONDELL. How long has this appropriation been carried?

Mr. LAMB. Since just last year.

Mr. MONDELL. What progress has been made, if any, in checking the ravages of the disease? It seems to me rather a large amount of money to spend for checking the ravages of one particular disease affecting a particular kind of tree, and that a tree which does not enter into commerce to a very considerable extent.

Mr. LAMB. It is a very valuable tree. It is being destroyed all over the United States.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. It is very valuable for tanning purposes.

Mr. LAMB. The chestnut itself is valuable.

Mr. MONDELL. The chestnut is a nice nut, and I should regret if we should be deprived of chestnuts in their season, but this is a good deal of money to spend. What progress have we made?

Mr. LAMB. The same progress that we are making in regard to destroying the other pests in the forests. They did not tell us exactly what they had done.

Mr. MONDELL. The department started in a number of years ago to spend a large amount of money in an attempt to destroy the pine beetle in the western country, and, so far as I know, they have made little progress. They are now about where they started.

Mr. LAMB. They have not had a long time in which to experiment with this pest. We just put it in last year.

Mr. LEVER. Dr. Howard in his statement before the committee says that they have progressed so far under the appropriation carried in the current year that, with this appropriation in this bill available for the next current year, in one more year's time they ought to be able to complete the job.

Mr. MONDELL. They hope to entirely wipe out the disease?

Mr. LEVER. That is the statement; to get it under control and stop it from spreading.

Mr. MONDELL. How long will it be before it again breaks out and we must again expend $80,000 a year?

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman understands the only way to get rid of the chestnut-bark beetle is, as I understand, to cut the tree down and destroy it, burn it; but the proposition is here to prevent the rapid spread of the disease; to throw lines around it, and to stop it from going to other States and forests.

Mr. MONDELL. To protect private property?

Mr. LEVER. I guess so. You understand that the chestnut tree is one of the most valuable trees in this section of the country, both for the purpose of tanning and for telegraph and telephone poles and things of that kind. It is a very valuable forest product.

Mr. MONDELL. I presume all the chestnut trees would be diseased if it were not for this $80,000 expenditure by the Government?

Mr. LEVER. All the tree chestnuts.

Mr. MONDELL. There might be a few chestnuts left, but not the sort that are affected by the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to secure some information. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this is not a duplication of this work?

Mr. LAMB. I think not.

Mr. BOOHER. On page 15 of the bill, a part already passed, I find this:

For the control of diseases of forest and ornamental trees and shrubs, $29,510.

Is not the investigation of the chestnut-tree disease covered under that appropriation?

Mr. LAMB. Twenty-nine thousand dollars would not go anywhere in controlling the chestnut-bark trouble. They wanted more money than this.

Mr. BOOHER. Is not that money enough to investigate and find out what causes it?

Mr. LAMB. You must go into the woods and destroy these pests, just as they did the moths in New England, and teach the people how to destroy them.

Mr. BOOHER. Have you got to go in the forests and destroy a hundred acres of trees in order to find the cause of the disease, or can you go to one tree and make a test on that tree and learn the cause?

Mr. LAMB. As to the modus operandi I can not tell you. I am not a scientist. I see here that we did not interrogate them closely as to this $80,000, because it is a new project, and we have every reason to trust scientists like Dr. Howard in matters like this.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] yield to me?

Mr. BOOHER. With pleasure.

Mr. HAWLEY. Part of this money will be used, I understand, in making known to those who own the trees the nature of the disease and the remedy. The sending out of men to induce these people to destroy valuable forests is a work of considerable magnitude. The only way to check the ravages of the pest is to destroy the affected trees, and naturally men who have good forests dislike to cut them down unless they are entirely persuaded of the necessity of it.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman this question in reply: Is it necessary to go to each man who owns a forest of chestnut trees and ask him to cut them down personally, or is a general order to that effect sufficient?

Mr. HAWLEY. We can not make an order.

Mr. BOOHER. But you issue bulletins?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Will not these men who own the forests be governed by what is said to them in the bulletins, or must you pound it into them with a club?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am inclined to believe that men who have many thousands of dollars tied up in a forest would hesitate, after merely reading a bulletin, to do that.

Mr. BOOHER. He would not undertake to help himself unless you went to him and had a personal interview with him and convinced him that it was to his advantage to cut down his trees?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the birds light on the trees and carry these spores that cause the blight on their feet, and thus spread the disease to many other men's chestnut trees, and in order to protect the entire forests on the Appalachian Mountains it is necessary to persuade the men whose forests are affected to get rid of the affected trees.

Mr. BOOHER. These are private forests, are they not?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. These are forests in the Appalachian Range, and the birds will go to other forests not yet affected and carry with them the infection.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman thinks this amount of money is necessary?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; I believe this is the least amount that would be adequate for the purpose, and I think it would be prudent to appropriate this amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1913, all publications issued by the Department of Agriculture shall be distributed under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, and the salaries or compensations of persons engaged in addressing, wrapping, mailing, or otherwise dispatching such publications, and necessary expenses for materials and supplies to be used in the work, shall be paid out of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, And the Public Printer shall return to the Department of Agriculture the machines, equipment, and unused materials, if any, transferred to the Government Printing Office in compliance with section 8 of the act of August 23, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 414).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] makes a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. I will withhold it.

Mr. BORLAND. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] makes a point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; if requested to do so by the committee.

Mr. LAMB. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to effect an exchange of lands and indemnity rights with the State of Montana, $25,000, to be available until expended when the said State shall have appropriated a like amount to be used in cooperation with the Forest Service for the aforesaid purpose: Provided, That such exchanges shall be made on the basis of approximately equal area and value.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what is proposed under this item which has just been read?

Mr. LAMB. This is a new item. Similar arrangements have been effected with other States where conditions are analogous—arrangements for the exchange of property in other States, just as in this instance, in North Dakota and Idaho. It is believed that these exchanges will subserve the best interests of both the Federal and State Governments. They want to exchange these lands where the State owns some land in a forest reserve for some land outside the forest reserve. It is an interchange of property. That is all it is.

Mr. MONDELL. Why does that interchange of lands entail such an expense as this?

Mr. LAMB. When the matter came up, I wrote to the Secretary and asked him to please fortify me with reasons along this line. I will read them.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will read the following letter from Secretary Wilson on this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 19, 1912.

Hon. JOHN LAMB,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

DEAR CAPT. LAMB: Your letter of December 14 with inclosures is received.

The proposed amendment of Mr. PRAY, of Montana, which you inclose is to appropriate $25,000 to effect an exchange of lands and indemnity rights with the State of Montana; the money to be available until expended, when the State shall have appropriated a like amount to be used in cooperation with the Forest Service for the aforesaid purpose. The memorandum, which you also inclosed with your letter, setting forth the reasons why the money should be appropriated states the case, as I understand it.

The location of State lands within the boundaries of national forests has for some time been one not easy of satisfactory adjustment to the Federal Government nor to the States. Sections 16 and 36 scattered throughout the State boundaries belong to the States if the official surveys were extended to those regions prior to the creation of the national forests. If, however, the boundaries of the Federal reservation were established prior to the identification of these selections by survey, the lands remain under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, but the State has the right to select other unappropriated, unsurveyed, public lands within the State boundaries under the act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat., 796). The State officials have informed me, however, that most of the lands open to selection by this State are of values inferior to the lands within the forest boundaries which the State would have to surrender. For this reason an agreement has been submitted to me signed by the governor of Montana in which it is proposed to effect an exchange of these lands. The State is to take lands of approximately equal value and area, after an examination is made and an appraisal made of the lands surrendered and the lands to be selected, the State selections to be made just within the boundaries of the national forest, but along the boundary line. When the examination and appraisal are completed, is is proposed to ask the President to sign a proclamation authorizing the exclusion of the selected lands and reducing the national forest boundaries accordingly.

A similar arrangement was effected with the State of South Dakota. That State has surrendered all of its indemnity rights within the national forest boundaries, and has secured title to a block of land in exchange for its scattered holdings. A similar agreement is now in force with the State of Idaho, which will permit Idaho to relinquish its indemnity rights for national forest lands as was done in the South Dakota case.

An estimate has been made by forest officers that the Montana exchange will cost approximately $50,000. The State officials have informed me that they will contribute one-half of this amount if the Federal Government will appropriate $25,000 for its share of the work.

I believe that these exchanges are in the best interests of both the Federal and the State Governments, and that the States are entitled to lands of approximately equal areas and values to the lands or indemnity rights surrendered; whereas, under the present conditions, with most of the valuable unappropriated public lands disposed of, the State can not secure the same values except by effecting an exchange for lands within the boundaries of national forests.

I have the honor, therefore, to recommend that Mr. PRAY'S amendment be given favorable consideration by your committee.

Very sincerely, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

The committee gave the matter favorable consideration, and this is the result.

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary's letter is very interesting, and it sets forth a state of facts with regard to which we are—some of us—quite familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have two minutes more. Most of my time was occupied by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the Secretary makes it very clear that the Government ought to be called upon to make so large an appropriation as this in connection with these exchanges. That the exchanges ought to be made is, I think, clear beyond question, but it rather appears to me that the State is endeavoring to unload the cost of the exchanges upon the Federal Government very largely.

Mr. LAMB. It is simply a trade of lands, just such as would be proper to make between individuals.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and there is no reason on earth why the Forestry officials in the ordinary discharge of their duties can not perform every act which is necessary to be performed without additional expense or without so large an expenditure as this.

Mr. LAMB. I think it is in the interest of the State and Federal Government to exchange the lands.

Mr. MONDELL. I think so; but it does not necessarily follow that we should throw away money because we are doing a good thing. I will not move to reduce, but I think the item large.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

That nothing contained in the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved June 26, 1912, shall be so construed as to prohibit the payment from the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture of expenses incidental to the delivery of lectures, the giving of instructions, or the acquiring of information at meetings by its employees on subjects relating to the work of the department authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. MANN reserved a point of order against the above paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. It is stated to the committee that the principal and most effective means of disseminating information by the Department of Agriculture is by lectures and addresses before organized bodies of farmers, such as farmers' institutes, grange meetings, lumbermen's associations, State and Federal chemists' associations, State agricultural societies, and the like, by officials in all branches and bureaus of the department; and unless some such proviso as the foregoing is enacted into law the work of the department will be greatly crippled or practically destroyed. This provision is to correct a mistake or error that was enacted into law last year at the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there was no mistake or error or misunderstanding in enacting that provision. It was enacted to eliminate one of the most vicious abuses in the entire governmental service, the practice of paying the expenses, membership fees, and other incidental expenses of various governmental employees attending meetings at various times. I do not say that the Department of Agriculture has no important work to do, and that the necessary expenses of certain employees of the department appearing before certain bodies to present their views by means of lectures should be paid. But this paragraph in the bill makes available every appropriation made for the Agricultural Department, without any limit, for this purpose. This department was one in which the greatest abuses existed. If I can prevent it, I do not propose that the same conditon shall be restored that existed prior to the enactment of the provision last year proposed to be repealed.

Last year three great reforms were instituted in connection with the governmental service. One was the consolidation of the distribution of public documents in the city of Washington, one was the elimination of the abuse connected with the payment of membership fees in societies and traveling expenses of Government employees attending meetings, and the third was prohibiting the increase of salaries in lump-sum appropriations, either by increase in the compensation or by transfers of persons upon the statutory roll at a fixed salary to the lump appropriation at a greater salary.

This bill proposes to take the Department of Agriculture from the operation of the three provisions of law enacted to obviate these abuses in the one department of the Government which was most notorious for abuses existing and one at which the provisions of law were aimed. I propose to take out this provision and the next provision, because they violate the rules of the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I presume that nothing I may say will induce either of the gentlemen who reserved the point of order from making it at the proper time. If I was absolutely sure of that fact, I would not take up the time to discuss the proposition, but I want to call the attention of these gentlemen and the members of the committee to this fact: The Department of Agriculture is a little differently constructed and situated to any other department of the Government. That is necessarily true. The law creating the Department of Agriculture directs it to collect and diffuse information relating to agriculture in the broadest and most comprehensive sense of that word.

The department must get its information not in its laboratories in Washington, not in its offices here, but it must go out into the field and get the information with which to educate the people in the field. It is necessary, therefore, in collecting the information, first of all, that the experts and scientists of the Department of Agriculture should attend from time to time the meetings of associations which involve membership of a character similar to theirs. For instance, it is a very important matter to have some gentleman from the Department of Agriculture attend the meetings of the Association of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations of the United States. These men who are carrying on the great work of educating the youth of the country along agricultural lines impart much valuable information to representatives of the department, who have the opportunity of hearing these lectures and discussions, and in turn can make available a great mass of information to the agricultural people of the country in general.

Another thing, throughout the country we have associations, for example, the National Live Stock Association, the dairy associations, and associations of all descriptions touching agriculture in its various phases.

It is absolutely necessary for the Department of Agriculture, if it is to maintain its high standard of leadership in agriculture, that its experts should be allowed to attend the meetings of these associations, not only to get information which is valuable, but what perhaps is more valuable, to be able to give information to these various associations composed of men scattered throughout the United States in every State. To do that it is necessary that these men, whose salaries are not exorbitant, should be given their traveling expenses, incidentals, and such expenses necessary in the attendance at the meetings of these associations.

That is all we desire to do in the item we have submitted here. If there are any abuses, the Committee on Agriculture knows nothing about it. Probably there have been abuses. I would like to know what service there is in the Government into which there does not creep from time to time abuses and to which we might point the finger on the floor of the House. I do not believe that the Department of Agriculture is any more guilty of a violation of the law or direction or intent of Congress than any other department of the Government, and I resent the imputation of the gentleman from New York on that proposition. I do not believe that the Department of Agriculture will violate this section for one minute. I do not believe it will violate the sections we are trying to repeal. If the Department of Agriculture is to continue its great work, if it is going to collect and disseminate information on agricultural subjects, then some way must be provided by which the expenses of the men gathering the information and giving it out shall be borne by the General Government.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, in regard to what has been said, I want to say that when Secretary Wilson was before our committee I asked him this question:

The CHAIRMAN. The next subject, Mr. Secretary, is one of considerable importance to us. It is the matter, you know, of traveling expenses, attending meetings, conventions, etc. You wrote me a long communication about it showing how it would touch the different bureaus, and I would like to have you express to the committee your frank and candid opinion about the matter.

Secretary WILSON. Well, you know our work is all outside of Washington. We keep the books in Washington, and things of that kind, but the actual work is out in the field among the people, and it is an educational work in nearly all respects. And when farmers want to hear from one of our people here we regard it as a good opportunity to give information, and so we always have been sending out some people. The privilege may have been abused, but nobody ever abused any of those privileges without being disciplined for doing it, and it is very rarely that I have ever been able to detect any abuses; very rarely. I think that my successor ought to have a pretty free hand in sending out men to give information. That is one of the ways by which the farmers get educated.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the following language, it seems to me, which you suggest, will relieve the situation. I will read it for the benefit of the committee, that it may get into the record:

"Nothing contained in the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved June 26, 1912, shall be construed so as to prohibit the payment from the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture of the expenses incidental to the delivery of lectures, the giving of instruction, or the acquiring of information as needed, by its employees, on subjects relating to the work of the department authorized by law."

That is what you suggest.

Secretary WILSON. That is intended to cure that. The matter is set forth fully in my letter to you under date of December 17, 1912, as follows:

DECEMBER 17, 1912.

Hon. JOHN LAMB,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives.

DEAR CAPT. LAMB: The act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the present fiscal year contains a provision reading as follows:

"SEC. 8. No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be expended for membership fees or dues of any officer or employee of the United States or of the District of Columbia in any society or association or for expenses of attendance of any person at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association, unless such fees, dues, or expenses are authorized to be paid by specific appropriations for such purposes or are provided for in express terms in some general appropriation."

You will recall that when the far-reaching effect of this provision became apparent that a section was included in the sundry civil act approved August 24, 1912, reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. That section 8 of the District of Columbia appropriation act, approved June 26, 1912, shall not take effect or be operative during the fiscal year 1913 except to the extent that it prohibits the payment of membership fees or dues in societies or associations: Provided, That during the fiscal year 1913 expenses of attendance of officers or employees of the Government at any meeting or convention of members of any society or association shall be incurred only on the written authority and direction of the heads of executive departments or other Government establishments or the government of the District of Columbia; and a detailed statement of all such expenses incurred from June 30 until December 1, 1912, shall be submitted to Congress on or before January 1, 1913."

It thus appears that unless remedial legislation is enacted, section 8 of the District bill as originally enacted will become operative on July 1, 1913. As this section prohibits the payment by the department of expenses of attendance of any person at any meeting or convention of any society or association, which has been construed to include farmers' meetings, the effect will be to practically paralyze some of the most important lines of work which the department is carrying on, as well as seriously interfere with many other phases of work.

Below is a summary of the manner in which the various bureaus, offices, and divisions of the department are affected by this legislation:

WEATHER BUREAU.

The Chief of the Weather Bureau, as well as the officers and employees of the bureau located in various parts of the country, is frequently called upon to explain to farmers' associations, commercial bodies of various kinds, and similar organizations the work of the Weather Bureau, and how the results of its investigations may be more fully utilized. The section in question will stop work of this nature entirely. It will also prevent the presentation of the work of the bureau before various scientific bodies except through publications.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The majority, if not all, of the lines of work conducted by the Bureau of Animal Industry are represented by associations, societies, etc. In order to secure efficient cooperation and keep in touch with the associations and societies conducting similar work it is essential that representatives of this bureau attend meetings of the associations; otherwise they will lose not only the opportunity to gain valuable information, but to explain, interest, and instruct those connected with various industries. A great deal of the work is also conducted in cooperation with city, county, and State governments. Cities are constantly asking the bureau for aid in securing pure milk; farmers want help in eradicating cattle ticks, sheep scabies, etc., in improving the stock of horses and cattle, and in many other lines of work.

The attendance of representatives of this bureau at county fairs, farmers' institutes, etc., affords the cheapest and most efficient way for the bureau to furnish the information desired.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

One of the principal and most effective means by which the bureau is able to secure the practical application by the farmers of the country of the many important discoveries which have been made by its experts and investigators is through addresses before organized bodies of farmers, such as farmers' institutes, grange meetings, farmers' unions, and the like. The effect of section 8 is to entirely cut off this important medium for the dissemination of information of great value to the farmers of the country.

It will be impossible to do effective organization work in connection with the boys' and girls' club work which has had such a marked benefit upon agricultural conditions in the South and which the bureau is now planning to extend through the northern States. Unless the local commercial and agricultural organizations can be interested in this work its chances of success are very slight.

It will be impossible to effectively carry out important work which has recently been inaugurated with a view to improving the present methods of growing, handling, grading, and marketing cotton, the fundamental basis of this work being the organization of the farmers in various sections into cotton-growing associations.

It will be impossible to keep in touch with the grain trade, which has been done heretofore through the various grain dealers' associations, in order to secure their cooperation in connection with the grain-grading investigations.

FOREST SERVICE.

By the attendance of members of the Forest Service at meetings of lumbermen and timberland owners much valuable information is gained by the service regarding the proper conduct of timber sales and information imparted as to forestry methods.

In connection with section 2 of the Weeks Act of March 1, 1911, the attendance of a representative of the service at the meetings of an association known as the Northwestern Foresters, including the State foresters of practically all of the States of the Northeast, is essential for the cooperative protection of the navigable watersheds from fire as contemplated by the act.

The 25,000 grazing permittees of the national forests are represented almost exclusively through various associations, with which associations the service must deal in connection with matters relating to grazing regulations. A proper understanding of the situation by all parties concerned requires the attendance of representatives of the service at meetings of the various associations.

For the better protection of the forests from fires the timber owners in the West have organized themselves into fire-protective associations. These associations hold frequent meetings to devise and discuss means of protection. It is evident that the Forest Service has much to gain by sending representatives to these meetings.

The effect of the section in question will be to practically prohibit the attendance of its members at any meeting of the character indicated above.

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

One of the most serious effects of the section in question will be to prevent the attendance of scientists of this bureau at the annual meetings of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, which is made up of State and Federal chemists. At this meeting technical methods for making chemical analyses are discussed and adopted. This is very important, for the reason that the regulations under the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906, require that the methods of analysis employed in the examination of samples in the enforcement of that act shall be those prescribed by the foregoing association.

Inability to attend meetings of the farmers' and trade organizations will not only stop one of the most effective ways of disseminating information obtained for the betterment of these industries but will greatly increase the cost of securing data necessary in many investigations. By attending a convention of the leading men of an industry it is frequently possible to secure information that would require travel to nearly every State in the Union if the information was obtained by visiting the individuals.

Some of the most important investigations are made in cooperation with semiofficial organizations, such as the United States Pharmacopœia Convention, and it is of great value to the men who are in charge of the investigations to get in touch with the workers in other organizations for the mutual exchange of ideas and reports of progress. This can best be done by attendance of the men at the conventions and meetings, which will be prevented by this section.

BUREAU OF SOILS.

The section in question will prevent the attendance of officers or employees of this bureau at meetings of technical societies, trade associations, meetings of farmers' associations, State agricultural societies, and county organizations. Experience has shown that attendance at such meetings is frequently the best and most effective way to disseminate information and data secured by the bureau, and very often discussion with groups of individuals at such meetings is the only practicable method and generally the cheapest method of obtaining information and data of inestimable value to the work of the bureau.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Section 8 will prove a serious detriment to the work of this bureau by prohibiting attendance at meetings of owners of timber and manufacturers of forest products to explain the results of its investigations and demonstrate practical methods of control or prevention of depredations by insects or meetings of entomologists to discuss scientific questions relating to the habits of insects and methods for their control. It is exceedingly convenient and economical to meet farmers at agricultural gatherings and address them on subjects in which they are vitally interested. The enforcement of this section would prevent in a great measure the attainment of one of the primary objects of the bureau, namely, the dissemination of information and instruction on practical results secured from scientific investigations.

BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Much of the work of this bureau is done in cooperation with numerous National, State, and local associations, such as National and State game associations, National and State Audubon societies, State experiment stations, and ornithological societies, whereby it is enabled to accomplish vastly more work than would otherwise be possible. In order to continue this mutually beneficial relationship it is frequently necessary that representatives of the bureau attend meetings of such associations where lines of work similar to those carried on by the bureau are discussed and future work of a like character planned. Attendance by representatives of the bureau at such meetings not only extends opportunities for cooperative work, but the bureau obtains valuable publicity for its own investigations, thereby greatly extending its usefulness to the public. To withdraw this privilege would seriously cripple some of the most effective and valuable work of the bureau.

OFFICE OF EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

This office has for many years worked in closest connection with and formed a very vital part of the Association of American Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations. The work with this association has been one of the largest features of the office's activity, and the meetings of the association have furnished the most valuable opportunity that could be presented for the discussion of matters pertaining to the experiment stations and the development of agricultural instruction.

The work of the office for the farmers' institutes of the country in their better organization and higher efficiency has been carried on effectively through the American Association of Farmers' Institute Workers. There is no means by which the department can as effectively prosecute its work for the advancement of the farmers' institutes as through this association.

In the conduct of its work in the interest of irrigation and drainage its men are constantly called upon to attend meetings of farmers' clubs, water users' associations, drainage associations, or other bodies who take an active interest in irrigation and drainage.

The attention which the National Education Association is now giving to matters pertaining to agricultural instruction has developed largely out of the work which representatives of this office have done in the association by attendance at its various meetings. All of the foregoing activities will be seriously checked, if not entirely stopped, by the section in question.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

During the fiscal year just ended the representatives of this office delivered over 700 lectures and addresses, most of these lectures being given at farmers' meetings, such as farmers' institutes, grange meetings, gatherings called especially for the purpose of discussing road problems, and at colleges, universities, and public schools, and before road conventions and associations.

This method of disseminating information has been productive of excellent results, and it is believed if this work is stopped that it will have a baneful effect upon the good-roads movement in the United States.

In order to secure relief from the difficulties set forth above it is suggested that a paragraph similar to the one below be embodied in the pending Agricultural bill:

"Nothing contained in the act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved June 26, 1912, shall be construed so as to prohibit the payment from the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture of expenses incidental to the delivery of lectures, the giving of instruction or the acquiring of information at meetings by its employees on subjects relating to the work of the department authorized by law."

Respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Then follows the letter he refers to, which he sent me in reply to my inquiry. He states that of about 13,000 employees in the department there are only a small number in Washington. These people go out and get information, and if you fix the law so they can not go out you stop the operation. That is the sum total of this proposition, and it is for the House to say what it will do.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a number of years ago I moved two amendments to the Agriculture appropriation bill, which are carried on page 36 of the bill, prohibiting the payment of certain traveling expenses, prohibiting payment for certain classes of publications, and so forth. At the time those amendments were adopted it was very apparent that the Agriculture Department, and particularly the Forestry Bureau, had expended a large amount of public money in sending men about over the country to influence local gatherings. At one meeting held in the far West there were over 100 representatives of the Agriculture Department, and what ought to have been a meeting expressing the sentiment of the locality, for it was called for that purpose, became a meeting largely controlled or influenced by Federal officials. The Forestry Bureau at one time kept men going about the country giving lectures. It paid, as the gentlemen from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has just said, for instruction in colleges and for traveling expenses of rangers, Federal officials attending, going back and forth to these schools. I heard an echo of that sort of practice the other day in a demand made on a former ranger in the service for the return to the Federal Government of the moneys advanced to pay for his transportation going to and returning from a forestry school.

I grant you, Mr. Chairman, that it would be perfectly lovely if some of us—of course we could not all enjoy that privilege—could invite into our districts gentlemen connected with the Agriculture Department, with beautiful lantern slides and fine lanterns, and have them edify and possibly instruct our people relative to the activities of the department. This sort of thing might be so worked as to be very valuable as an adjunct of a campaign, and far be it from me to refuse to any gentleman who ought to return to the House the opportunity of increasing his majorities in this way.

But the difficulty is that the departments have not been inclined to confine their activities to the dissemination of knowledge or to the entertainment of our constituencies, to our considerable benefit, alone, but they have gone about deliberately manufacturing public sentiment oftentimes contrary to the announced policy of Congress. This was formerly done by employees of the Forestry Service, of the Bureau of Good Roads; by employees of other bureaus.

We all ought to realize that the more active and forceful a man is in the discharge of his public duties in the bureaus the more necessary it sometimes becomes to prevent him, in the exuberance of his enthusiasm, from attempting to use the money and the influence of the Government for the purpose of developing sentiment in lines and directions which Congress has not approved. And it seems to me that even should we go so far as to provide for illustrated lectures for the benefit of gentlemen fortunate enough to secure them for their constituents, we at least ought not to deliberately appropriate the people's money for the purpose of having it used to build up the bureaus rather than to disseminate information and to cultivate a sentiment favorable to the extension of Federal activities into questionable fields.

If this provision goes out, these gentlemen will still have abundant opportunities to appear at meetings. There are lawful and proper ways to accomplish that to a reasonable extent. The people expect it, and such appearances and the information and entertainment that Federal officials can and do furnish is very helpful and useful. The authority now asked would likely be abused.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter section 7 of the act approved August 26, 1912 (37 Stat., p. 262), shall not apply to the payment, out of moneys appropriated or which may be hereafter appropriated in lump sum for the Department of Agriculture, for personal services of employees engaged in scientific or technical work: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to authorize the transfer of any person employed at a specific salary and the payment of compensation from lump-sum appropriations at a rate greater than said specific salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the paragraph.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Very well.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I would like the House to know what the Secretary said on this subject when we had him before us:

It is possible that the committee does not fully appreciate the extent of the department's annual loss due to the resignation of capable and trained employees, particularly scientific and technical employees, who are offered and accept more lucrative employment either in other branches of the Government service or the commercial world outside. Appreciating the fact that our losses on this account were considerable, and desiring specific and exact information on the subject, I recently requested the chiefs of the various bureaus of the department to submit to me a list of the scientific and technical employees under their supervision who had separated from the service during the preceding year for the purpose of bettering themselves financially elsewhere. I discovered that during the period of one year prior to last October the department had lost in this way not less than 203 efficient and valuable employees of this character.

The number itself is impressive. It should also be remembered that offers from the outside are always made to men of particular value to us. In addition, the department also loses many of the executive and clerical employees in the same way, but it is not so difficult to fill their places as it is in the case of scientific and technical employees. These losses will possibly continue, for men of scientific training command larger salaries in the commercial world than in the Government service, and it would seem to be a distinct gain to the Government by means of reasonable recognition of valuable service to check such losses as far as possible. So, Mr. Chairman, we will have to lift the salaries just a little bit to keep the educators of the department. That is what this provision is for. When we transferred from the lump sum to the statutory roll all of these people we brought along with us men who were receiving salaries from $1,200 to $1,500, and there is no opportunity for these people to get any increase now save by congressional action.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia, does not the gentleman think it is bad practice for men to be paid out of lump-sum appropriations?

Mr. LAMB. I will say to the gentleman that if we had at the head of every one of these bureaus men of iron will and nerve that perhaps it would be the best way possible. I know of instances here in other departments where men of that character have taken charge of bureaus and with two-thirds of the men have done more work than was before done in the bureau.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be so in some instances, but if you can do better with lump-sum appropriations why not appropriate for the Agriculture Department $17,000,000 and say to them, "Go and do what you will with it and show us the result"?

Mr. LAMB. My friend well knows that in the Agricultural Department, with all these bureaus and divisions, with the great Animal Industry, the Weather Bureau, the Plant Industry, and so forth, that it would be simply impossible to do it, hence we have a lump-sum fund and a statutory roll.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman, but I think that the Congress ought to fix the salary.

Mr. LAMB. Do not understand that I fail to appreciate the difficulty connected with it, but we encounter difficulties everywhere.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman will recall the abuses that have grown out of these matters have been where you have had lump-sum appropriations and the head of the department has been permitted to fix the salaries of men which have been out of proportion to what other men in the Government service have been receiving, men just as competent.

Mr. LAMB. I have made my statement, gentlemen, and I leave it to you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt this provision stops a very gross abuse and this would permit it to be reestablished in this department which by this practice took away from every other department of the Government the most competent men. Nobody can prevent or stop men from leaving the Government service to better themselves outside. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing and distributing of farm products, and for the employment of persons and means necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $50,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. What is the point of order? We might as well dispose of it.

Mr. BORLAND. The point of order is that it is new legislation.

Mr. LEVER. I am willing to challenge that proposition.

Mr. MANN. It is not legislation at all, it is an appropriation.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, in discussing the point of order that there is a very grave question whether the marketing of crops or anything else is a part of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield for a moment?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We are met with a peculiar situation. Last year we directed the Secretary of Agriculture to make an investigation and report upon this subject matter, and he has reported in a volume that covers several hundred pages. I do not know whether the gentleman from Missouri has examined that volume or not. It has been rather difficult to obtain. I received a copy and read it through and sent it to another gentleman who was anxious to get it. The limit of the number published was 1,000, and it has been very difficult to obtain it. He went into this subject very fully. The Senate has passed a bill to create a division under the Bureau of Statistics in the Agricultural Department. That bill has been reported to the House by the Committee on Agriculture in the House.

In this report of the Secretary of Agriculture it clearly appears that to carry out the provisions of the bill that the Senate has passed, and which is now standing before the House, would involve untold sums of money. No one can dream how much it would cost, but my judgment leads me to believe that it would be from $200,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 a year.

Now, here is a proposition to undertake this work in a progressive and sensible manner, and see what it will cost and what can be done before it is enacted into law. The same item would be subject to a point of order another year. But if this Senate bill passes the House, and my judgment is it will pass the House, and this item goes out of the appropriation bill, then we have an organic law that will involve the expenditure there of hundreds of millions of dollars a year and a control by the Government of the market supplies throughout the United States on every agricultural product. With that view of it, is it not more sensible to try this experiment at a cost of $50,000 for one year? And if it works well undoubtedly it would be increased in the course of time to a larger sum, but never out of the control of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], if he is here, on a point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman's argument reach necessarily in the direction of increasing these amounts from year to year? He says the purpose in view under the Senate bill would require an untold amount of money and perhaps involve the Federal Government in the marketing and distribution of all agricultural crops.

Mr. LEVER. Not at all.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, is not this the first step toward that sort of a plan?

Mr. MANN. I think this would prevent that sort of a plan. The adoption of this item in the bill would prevent the adoption of the plan proposed by the Senate bill. The Agricultural Department, in the report made by the Secretary, does not desire the passage of the Senate bill; and we will know more by this experiment, and yet will not have written into the organic law a provision authorizing the appropriation of untold sums which we will not wish to appropriate, but which will be appropriated if this authority is given.

Mr. LEVER. This language enables the Department of Agriculture to do nothing more than to acquire and diffuse among the people information on the subject of the marketing and distribution of farm products. It is not necessary to control the marketing or to gather information.

Mr. BORLAND. It must necessarily lead to the control of the marketing, else there would be no advantage in it. Market reports are sent out from live-stock agencies, from produce companies, and from elevator companies every day now. There is no lack of market reports.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We see them in the newspapers every day.

Mr. MANN. I think if the gentleman has read this book, issued by the Department of Agriculture, he will understand how they can profitably expend at once $50,000, and possibly $100,000, a year, without entering upon the proposition carried in the Senate bill. And the department does not wish to do it. For instance, this is a part of the general summing up of the book published by the department:

General market-news service is not recommended.

Although that would be covered by the Senate bill.

If such service were derived from telegraphic reports, the expense would be enormous.

That is not urged and not carried by this, although it would be carried by the Senate bill. All along the line it would be the same thing. I hope in the interests of economy the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold for just a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read from the section of the statute creating the Department of Agriculture:

SEC. 520. There shall be at the seat of government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

Now, taking that definition of the purpose of the Department of Agriculture, and then looking at the language of this section, the Chair would like to have the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] indicate in what way he thinks this paragraph is not in order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there are two reasons why I think this paragraph is not in order. One is that it provides for a new branch of activity not contemplated by the fundamental act of the Department of Agriculture, and the other is that it provides for a branch of activity which is not within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture or of the Federal Government. But I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this is an experimental appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear what the gentleman from Missouri is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BORLAND. I say I have grave doubts whether this is in the power of the Department of Agriculture as it is created, or whether it is within the power of any department of the Government to collect and furnish these market reports. But I understand that this is an experimental appropriation. The amount is so small that necessarily it must be experimental, because very little information could be collected and disseminated for $50,000 over a country as large as this. It is to determine whether the thing is feasible and to what extent it can be carried. The point of order would be just as good against the renewal of this appropriation in succeeding years, and for that reason I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an editorial from the Louisville (Ky.) Courier Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LESTER BRYANT.

There will be general and profound sorrow in Kentucky because of the tragic end of Lester Bryant, the boy corn grower of Warren County. His death by asphyxiation in a Washington rooming house was a most pitiful and unexpected termination of what otherwise would have been one of the memorable events of his life. Lester Bryant's labor was worth much to his county and his example was worth much to his State. His untimely death is a loss not only to his parents, his friends, and his county, but, in some degree, a loss to the Commonwealth and to the country at large. Boys of his sturdy character and manly achievements are needed in State and in Nation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, last year young Kimbrough, a 15-year-old boy from my district, came to Washington to receive a prize for having produced more corn on 1 acre of ground than any other boy in the State of Alabama. He produced on 1 acre 224 bushels of corn. Well do I remember the impression he made upon me when I saw him in the gallery of this House, how I looked with admiration upon the manly little fellow and prophesied the time when he would become an ideal farmer in my State.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago a Kentucky boy, Lester Bryant, came to Washington to receive a prize that he had won for producing more white corn on 1 acre of ground in Kentucky than any other boy produced on a like area in half a dozen States around him. He died in this city and now sleeps on the slope of a hill near the field where he wielded the hoe and guided the plow in producing that record-breaking yield. While we have under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I want to lay a simple and deserved tribute upon the new-made grave of this little Kentucky boy who did so much for agriculture in the United States. I know, Mr. Chairman, that what I may say will not affect him now, but it may be of some comfort to his loved ones and friends and may be of some value to some farmer's boy somewhere.

He was born and reared on a Kentucky farm, and when the Secretary of Agriculture called for boy volunteers to help increase the corn supply of the United States he became a volunteer in the army of American corn growers. This army was composed of 75,000 American boys, and Lester Bryant was only a private in the ranks; but, Mr. Chairman, there was chance for promotion, and opportunity was given to become an honored captain in that industrial army. This youthful Kentucky farmer at the end of 12 months' service was one of 50 boys chosen from the ranks of 75,000 as a prize winner in a contest where industry and skill of a high order were essential to success. He won his promotion from the place of a private in the ranks to the office of a captain in this industrial army, and he came here to receive his commission at the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, the commander in chief of the corn boys' army.

When his eyes beheld for the first time this glorious capital of our country, how beautiful the vision to his enraptured gaze. But, Mr. Chairman, within a few hours of the time when he would have heard the Secretary of Agriculture say, "Well done, my boy; you have won the prize," death touched him and he fell into that mysterious sleep that kisses down his eyelids still. The news of his sad and untimely death sent a pang of sorrow through this House and over the country. Plucked out of life when hope was high and the future seemed so bright—dead in the morning of a happy, buoyant youth time. And yet, Mr. Chairman, he did more in his brief time on earth to teach the art of intensive farming than thousands of men who have lived long and died of sheer old age. He has done more for his State and Nation in emphasizing the marvelous possibilities of 1 acre of ground than thousands of men who have lived their threescore years and ten. He was a little missionary carrying to the farmers of his State and Nation the gospel of intelligent, scientific farming, and the fact that he did accomplish so much by the intelligent cultivation of 1 acre of ground will stand out an example and beacon light to every farmer boy who aspires to become a successful farmer. He broke the soil deep, carefully prepared the ground, and selected the seed corn that he planted. He devoted time and labor to the careful cultivation of that 1 acre of ground, and when the harvest time came, amongst all those seeking the prize for the greatest yield of white corn on 1 acre of ground, his name led all the rest. The soil yielded her increase and gave to this farmer boy a record-breaking yield, and Lester Bryant in the sweat of his face became a hero on the field of agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, he was on the corn boys' firing line in the battle for bread. He had enlisted in a noble cause, and before he was 15 years of age surpassed all that had been accomplished on the British farm in the heyday of its production, when, as Goldsmith in his "Deserted Village" wrote, "Every rood of ground maintained its man." He produced on 4 roods of ground, or 1 acre, enough corn to maintain not 4 but 11 men. He had overcome difficulties that stood in the way of generations of farmers before him. He had removed the barriers over which thousands of farmers had stumbled in their efforts to make the earth yield her increase. He wooed the soil and she told him her secrets. He touched the growing corn with the magic wand of his skill and genius and it responded with luxuriant growth to his intelligent touch. This young Kentucky farmer, this little wizard of the cornfield, has rendered his State and Nation a great service in showing the productive possibilities of the soil. He has made a splendid contribution to scientific agriculture. He has produced from 1 acre of ground six times as much as used to be considered a fair yield. Mr. Chairman, we are told that the man who makes two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before is a benefactor. How much greater, then, the service of this little boy who made 6 bushels of corn to grow where only 1 grew before. This little Kentucky boy bade fair to become an ideal farmer. The example of his sturdy life and the work that he has wrought will be of benefit to his fellows in the years to come. He did not lean upon his hoe and gaze upon the ground, as did the desponding peasant in Markham's "Man with the Hoe," but with head erect and light upon his face stood there on his father's farm a perfect little prince in the kingdom of agriculture. The father looks with affection and pride upon such an industrious, sturdy son, and the good mother blesses the day that he was born. Some boys despise work. John Ruskin has truly said:

There is an idle class among both rich and poor, weak, wicked, and miserable. There is a working class among both rich and poor, strong, healthy, and happy.

Lester Bryant belonged to the working class of which John Ruskin spoke. He had enlisted for life in the agricultural army of his country. Mr. Chairman, it is a sad thing to see a boy drifting aimlessly along, devoid of pluck and energy, lazy, and indolent; but how supremely refreshing and how pleasing to see a boy full of vim and energy, buoyant, industrious, and hopeful, doing what his hands find to do. This youthful Kentucky farmer was such a boy. He was a blessing to his parents and a distinct benefit to his day and generation. Peace to his ashes.

The hoe that he wielded will be covered with dust,
The plow that he guided be still;
The trace chains be red with rust,
While he sleeps on the slope of the hill.

But the things that he wrought on the old Kentucky farm will live long after he has passed into silence and pathetic dust. My heart goes out to his loved ones.

How sadly they miss him there now,
But God in his goodness will comfort the home
Where the little boy guided the plow.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, at the end of line 13, page 64, the following as a new paragraph: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation for rent of buildings used by the Agricultural Department in the District of Columbia shall exceed 6 per cent and taxes for the District of Columbia on a fair valuation of such buildings and grounds."

Mr. LAMB. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. LEVY. This is a limitation.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is not offered at the proper place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, that it is not germane to the portion of the bill to which it has been offered.

Mr. LEVY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to return to page 53 of the bill for the purpose of offering the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

A few moments ago, in the discussion of a point of order raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture gave it as his opinion that the officials of the department could be depended upon not to abuse any discretion lodged in them. I agree with the gentleman that public officials generally—possibly the officials of the Department of Agriculture particularly—can quite generally be depended upon to keep within the purview of the law. There are, however, some possible exceptions. We must recall the ambition of men to extend their authority and jurisdiction, and we must remember that the best of men are sometimes prone to extend as far as possible their authority under the law.

Several years ago it came to the attention of the Committee on the Public Lands that at one time and another there had been reserved by Executive order and otherwise a number of so-called bird reserves, mostly along the Gulf of Mexico and the two coasts; and we were informed that there was no law under which the birds on those reserved lands could be protected, and therefore a bill was presented providing for the protection of those birds in the following language:

Whoever shall hunt, trap, capture, willfully disturb, or kill any bird of any kind whatever, or take the eggs of any such bird, on any lands of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds, by any law, proclamation, or Executive order, except under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may, from time to time, prescribe, shall be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

In addition to what I have read, which is the law, there was a provision that the President should thereafter have authority to create such reserves. Those words were stricken out. The committee had some hesitation about passing the law, and thereby, by inference, either justifying what had been done or making lawful the reservations already made; but being assured that there were only a few of them, and being informed as to their locality and the character of the land embraced in them, the act was passed. It undoubtedly validated so far as we could the acts by which these reserves were created; but the committee declined to report, and the Congress did not grant authority to create so-called bird preserves.

Immediately after the passage of that bill there were created by Executive order many so-called bird preserves. At any rate there are 30 or 40 of them at this time; possibly more, for I have not kept track of the matter of late. My attention was called to the matter by reason of one of those reserves in my State, which was a rather peculiar proposition to say the least.

Application had been made for the right to flood certain lands and form a lake for irrigation storage purposes, and around the border of that proposed lake a bird preserve, I think 300 feet in width, was attempted to be created by Executive proclamation, and as the lake was to be of considerable size it formed a preserve, if it formed anything at all, some 300 feet in width, a complete circle around the lake some 5 miles in diameter, a gigantic doughnut. Well, the reservoir was never created. The land is still dry, and this ring around the rosy of a bird pasture is still there, so far as an Executive proclamation can place and keep it there. There have been some very interesting speculations as to just what would occur if some one stood off the reserve and shot on to it, or stood upon the reserve and fired a gun in the other direction, contrary to the rules and regulations made and established by the Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. LAMB. What is the gentleman's purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call attention to the excuse the department gave for doing this thing that I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Naturally I made inquiry as to the authority of the department to go within a State, create a bird pasture, and attempt to prohibit the control of the State over the game birds within its borders. I asked to be cited to the statute under which it was accomplished. This statute which I have just read was cited as authority; this statute in the enactment of which the committee and Congress refused to grant any authority to create these reserves; this statute, which did nothing else, and did that only at the earnest plea of the Bureau of Biology of the Department of Agriculture, that we validate, if we could, those Executive orders that had been issued, creating certain bird preserves, mostly on rocky and uninhabited and uninhabitable islands along the coast. This law, which by no possible reasonable construction, either on the basis of language or intent, can be held to grant such authority, is being invoked from time to time by the department as authority to do that which Congress refused to do.

We have many of these so-called reserves. We have them about all of the storage reservoirs of the Reclamation Service. We have them scattered in many places where men have asked for rights of way to impound water for agricultural reclamation purposes within the borders of States, without authority of law. In the bill before us is an appropriation for carrying out the provisions of that act I have referred to. That appropriation, if used for the care of the reserves established prior to the passage of the act which I have read, will be used legally and properly, but it will no doubt also be used in an attempt to care for and protect birds on reserves attempted to be established without authority of Congress and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

I suppose, however, it is rather superfluous to refer to that feature of the situation, because what is the Constitution, anyway, in the face of the desire of a bureau to extend its authority and jurisdiction?

I simply refer to this as an illustration of the fact, somewhat doubted evidently by the gentleman from Virginia, that sometimes very good men in the bureaus, in their ambition to extend their jurisdiction, authority, and control, very curiously interpret acts of Congress.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there was more or less said a little while ago in reference to the traveling expenses under the Department of Agriculture, on account of lectures, and so forth, and gentlemen might obtain the impression that the Department of Agriculture had been grossly extravagant in the past in the matter of traveling expenses. The present law forbidding the pay for traveling expenses for lectures, and so forth, only went into the current law last summer. I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of Agriculture of the traveling expenses incurred by the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912.

It is a document of some 144 pages long, giving in detail all of the expenditures for travel. The total appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for that year, including permanent appropriations, amounted approximately to nineteen or twenty million dollars, and the total traveling expenses were about 1 per cent, or $190,105.31. That is not an extravagant amount, considering that the large share of the work of the Agricultural Department must necessarily be done by people going from one place to another. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD certain memoranda showing the total expenditures by the different divisions for that year for traveling expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be instructed to correct all the totals where necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the Clerk change the totals where necessary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28283) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAMB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 28730) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, which was read the first and second times and, with the accompanying papers, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. (H. Rept. 1504.)

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that immediately after the termination of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, I shall call up the pension bill for consideration.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 28094. An act to amend section 96, chapter 5, of the act of Congress of March 3, 1911, entitled "The Judicial Code."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14053) to increase the pensions of surviving soldiers of Indian wars in certain cases.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 8035) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I move to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill S. 4043, and I desire to make an explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order that the motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4043) divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this motion is not a privileged motion, and I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under the rule, Senate bills on the Speaker's table, substantially similar to House bills which have been favorably reported and which do not require consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, may be laid before the House for consideration upon the request of the committee having jurisdiction. I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the bill as passed by the Senate is not substantially the same as that reported by the House committee. The House committee reported a bill and proposed that certain amendments be adopted, but the text of the bill is substantially different from the form in which it passed.

The purpose of this rule, as appears from some of the Precedents, was to permit the House to consider certain classes of business which did not require consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under certain conditions. It has invariably been held that in order to consider a Senate bill the House bill must not only have been reported from the committee in advance of the passage of the Senate bill, but must actually be on the House Calendar.

There is no such House bill now in the House nor in any committee of the House. The bill which had been reported by the committee on this subject has been disposed of by the House, and the Chair will not find, in my opinion, any precedent, nor can he recall any instance, in which it has been held in order to call up a Senate bill under conditions where the House bill was not actually on the House Calendar.

There is no House bill upon the House Calendar. There is no House bill in the House at all. It has left the House. The purpose of the rule was to give an opportunity to consider a Senate bill in lieu of the House bill that was awaiting consideration. I have looked through the precedents. I have inquired of gentlemen of some service in the House. I have tried to recall instances in the House myself. It is possible that I have overlooked some such cases, but I have no knowledge of any ever having been considered. It is very apparent from the fact that there is no such instance that the rule and the practice under the rule does not operate to permit such a motion as this to be made, unless the bill is actually on the House Calendar awaiting consideration.

For instance, if a committee of the House has a bill under consideration and the Senate passes a bill which goes to the Speaker's table, if it is not of such a character as would require consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and subsequently, but prior to the disposition of the bill on the Speaker's table the House committee reports a bill substantially the same, it is not possible to consider the Senate bill from the Speaker's table. The Speaker's table is one of the calendars of the House. It is a calendar to which a certain class of business goes under the rule for disposition, and the theory of this rule is that a House bill not requiring consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union being on one particular calendar, the House Calendar, and a Senate bill, substantially the same, coming to the House and being upon another calendar, the Speaker's table, in order to facilitate the disposition of the bill it is in order to consider the bill on the calendar known as the Speaker's table rather than to await the day to call up the bill upon the House Calendar. I do not know of any precedent under which the motion is in order to proceed to consider this bill, in view of the fact that the House bill is no longer in the House. I do not wish to unduly delay the matter, but my investigation convinces me that this is a novel and unknown and unusual attempt to construe a rule far beyond what was intended or what has been the practice in the House.

Mr. CLAYTON rose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Alabama proceeds, I suggest that he permit me to proceed, as undoubtedly he will desire to answer both the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and myself.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will yield to the gentleman with great pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill as reported to the House, which, it is claimed, would authorize the calling up of the Senate bill, is House bill 17593. That bill contains a number of provisions which are not in the Senate bill. One of those provisions, which went to the very essence of the House bill as reported to the House, is:

And any and all contracts pertaining to such transactions are hereby declared to be null and void, and no suit or action shall be maintained in any court of the United States upon such contract or contracts or for the enforcement or protection of any alleged right based upon or growing out of such contract or contracts, or for the protection in any manner whatsoever of such prohibited transactions.

That provision was an essential provision in the House bill as introduced. The Committee on the Judiciary in reporting the bill back to the House recommended various amendments to the House bill, including the striking out of the provision which I have read. It is quite clear, I take it, that if the House bill is to be considered as introduced into the House, then the present Senate bill is not substantially similar to the House bill, because in the Senate bill the provision which I have just read does not appear; but the Committee on the Judiciary of the House in reporting the bill back to the House recommends the striking out of that provision, and, I take it, the question is now before the Speaker whether, in determining if the Senate bill is substantially similar to the House bill, the Speaker shall consider that the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee have been adopted at the time the bill is reported back to the House.

I am aware of the ruling made by the Speaker, and the proper ruling, that if the committee had proposed to add new, substantive propositions, then the Senate bill must be similar to those, but the matter comes in the same way that it does in respect to the reference of a bill to the House Calendar or the Union Calendar. If this bill, as introduced into the House, was a House Calendar bill, carrying no appropriation when reported back, it would go to the House Calendar. If, however, the Committee on the Judiciary had proposed an amendment to the bill carrying an appropriation that amendment would carry the bill to the Union Calendar. On the other hand, if the bill as introduced had carried an appropriation, that would carry it to the Union Calendar, nor would a committee amendment to strike out the appropriation take it from the Union Calendar and refer it to the House Calendar. Either by way of committee amendment or by way of original provision in the bill, if an appropriation is involved, it must go to the Union Calendar.

I maintain that the same principle relates to Senate bills called up from the Speaker's table, that if there is a provision in the House bill which the committee proposes to strike out by way of amendment, or if the committee proposes to add by way of amendment a new provision, either one of which is substantially different from the provision in the Senate bill, then the bill can not be taken from the Speaker's table. The Speaker will notice the taking of a Senate bill from the Speaker's table is an exception to the general rule, and ought not to be permitted unless the rule is complied with. I do not think the Speaker can assume, when a bill is reported to the House from a committee, with amendments to strike out part of the language, that that language is to be excluded in considering the question as to whether the bill is similar. Any other ruling would lead to this: Suppose a House committee wishes to bring some matter before the House by way of a Senate bill entirely different from the provisions that they wish enacted into law. Some gentleman in the House introduces a bill containing very important propositions which have not been included in the Senate bill, and thereupon the committee reports the bill back with the recommendation that all of its provisions be stricken out and get the right to call up the Senate bill, and the right would at once exist to add to the Senate bill by amendment and other provisions which the committee has reported in favor of striking out and does not intend to have stricken out. A ruling of that kind, it seems to me, gives a much wider power to the committees in reference to the procedure of the House than they now have, and committees now absorb—I was going to say too much power in the House—certainly quite enough power in the House, and there is no pretense that this Senate bill as it comes over here is similar to the House bill, the Webb bill, as introduced into the House or as reported into the House, unless the Speaker considers that the amendments are agreed to when the bill is reported back to the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed with this discussion, so the matter may be terminated early, but the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] desires to address the Chair in opposition to my motion, and I have no disposition to prevent him from speaking and giving his views, and I therefore yield to him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I want to say I feel that the point of order is well taken on this motion. I think so for two reasons, both of which have been given by the gentlemen who have already addressed the Chair in support of the point of order; and yet I want to elaborate somewhat, if I can, on both of them. Section 2 of Rule XXIV provides, among other things:

> But House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House, and not required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, be disposed of in the same manner on motion directed to be made by such committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who made this point of order, called to the attention of the Chair in the beginning of his remarks, the practice has always been, without exception, as far as my investigation discloses—and I have endeavored to make some investigation—that these House bills, substantially similar in character, which are referred to by this rule must be pending on some House calendar when the effort is made to call up a Senate bill that is substantially the same from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Georgia or the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Illinois state if he can find a precedent for taking that position?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I have one that comes very near to it, and I will read it to the Chair and then the Chair can judge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK (reading):

> On May 11, 1898, Mr. Lorenzo Danford, of New York, called up from the Speaker's table, by direction of the Committee on Immigration, the bill (S. 112) to amend the immigration laws of the United States, and asked its consideration on the ground that it was substantially the same as a House bill already on the House Calendar.

Now, I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that that point has ever been precisely ruled that the bill must be at the time on the House Calendar—and the Chair sees in the case I cite the statement is that a substantially similar bill was pending on one of the House calendars.

I venture this assertion, and I do not think it can be successfully contradicted either now or later, here or elsewhere, that nowhere in the precedents will you find any case in which a bill has been called up from the Speaker's table under circumstances like these, when nowhere on any House calendar was it pending in the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can argue only from the reasoning that is back of this rule. The rule intends that the House may not be surprised. Of course it may be true, as gentlemen will doubtless urge in conclusion, that the House will not be surprised in this particular instance, at least. Of course not, as a matter of fact, so far as this particular matter is concerned.

Let us see to where that would lead the Chair and to what theory it would commit the House if this motion be held in order. If this can be done in the way that is proposed now, then if a House bill reported by any committee of the House were passed the first day of the first session, and went to the Senate and slumbered there, and everybody lost sight of it and forgot about the proposition, and it was not pending before any committee or on any House calendar, and on the last day of the session of the same Congress, if the Senate happened to pass a similar bill it could be called up without notice to anybody, without its being pending on any House calendar, even though the House calendars are for the admitted purpose of giving notice to Members of the matters that are pending and that may be called up.

It might be called up two years after the original proposition had passed the House and everybody had forgotten it. It seems to me on reason or principle it would be a most dangerous precedent. It seems to me it would be an unsafe thing. It seems to me it would be the liberalization of this rule to such an extent that it would be very dangerous and unsafe. We could not tell what position we would be in at any time if this procedure were adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while the point has not been precisely ruled in any authority I can find, it seems to me when you consider the reasoning back of this rule, when you consider the principle on which this rule rests, when you consider the safeguards that were intended to be thrown around the House in order to keep it from being surprised, if the Speaker should rule this motion in order, although it would not work any injustice at all in the present case, yet as a matter of practice and parliamentary law it would be unsound and dangerous to a degree.

Now, I want to address myself briefly to the point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It seems to me that his position is absolutely sound. I do not believe it can be answered. The House bill referred to in this rule is a bill introduced into the House and not the bill reported by the committee. If the report of the committee could change the character of the bill and change it, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, from one calendar to another, from the Union Calendar to the House Calendar or the Private Calendar, as the case might be, then you would see there would be absolutely no way in keeping out of inextricable confusion as to when this rule could be applied. The Senate bill that it is now proposed to call from the Speaker's table for immediate action of the House is substantially and materially different from the bill introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and which was voted on Saturday.

I freely confess that in this particular instance no hardship would be worked on the House; but if this precedent be established—and I appeal to the Chair because of the precedent that would be established if he permits this motion to be entertained—if this precedent be established, it will rise up to plague us in the days yet to come. We can not tell when some bill that was lost in the scrap heap at the other end of the Capitol will come back, months and even years afterwards, like this, to an unsuspecting House, with no notice given to the House by any of its calendars.

Mr. Speaker, in no instance can gentlemen cite a case in which this motion was made where the bill was not pending in the House and on some one of its calendars, and I feel that the Speaker ought to conclude that a fair construction of the rule means that the House itself has to be in a position of having the bill on one of its calendars before this motion shall be entertained.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I take it that it is always in order to apply good common sense to the construction of the rules in this House.

What have we here? This rule which has been read provides:

> But House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine, as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House, and not required to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill that has been taken from the Speaker's table and which has been read to the House is not only substantially the same as the bill which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and passed upon by the House, but it is precisely the same, with the exception of one word, which in no respect changes its substance or its form, as that passed by the House and Senate, too.

The purpose of the rule is not to protect men who are not diligent in keeping up with the legislation of the House and the Senate, but the purpose is to enable the House in a logical, easy, orderly manner to work its will where it has demonstrated its will in regard to this legislation.

A bill precisely the same as that which passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table passed the House and was reported from the committee. It is true that the bill which was introduced in the House was not the same, but the bill that was reported from the committee with the committee amendments was precisely the same. I take it that the Speaker, in construing the rule, will apply common sense and look to the substance and not so much to the form.

That is all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the statement of fact made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has said that twice before.

Mr. CLAYTON. When I made that statement a while ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] interrupted me, and I yielded to him. Therefore I desire to take up the thread of my discourse where, through courtesy, I left it off. Again, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it for the edification of the gentleman from New York, who uttered sotto voce the statement that twice I had said that. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, in other instances the gentleman from New York has not been accurate in his statement of facts. Certainly he has not been accurate in this instance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill that came from the Committee on the Judiciary is precisely the bill which is now on the Speaker's table. The bill as introduced by its author, Mr. WEBB, and which was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, was reported in the precise words of its author, with one exception. Where the word "used" in a particular place was employed by the author, the committee struck out the word "used" and substituted the word "sold," in no wise interfering with the bill or with its intent or with its operation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude this statement, I was going to show another thing.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to point out an error in the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was about to say we had stricken from the Webb bill some other language.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that only one change had been made.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was completing my statement, and I did not have the opportunity to complete it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman mentioned only one, and in that he was erroneous about what was done.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, the Member who has at this time the privilege of addressing the Chair thinks he is accurate; and I again repeat, Mr. Speaker, that, with the exception I have noted, and with this other exception that I was about to explain, this bill as it came from the Senate is precisely the Webb bill as it was introduced by the author and precisely the bill as was reported. The Webb bill had other language in it before it passed the House. The committee amended that bill by striking out some words as being unnecessary, some of them as being superfluous, and some that the committee did not agree to. But the Webb bill was preserved in its primary purpose and intent from the time it was introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] until it was reported by the committee and as it was reported by the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so much for the statement of fact made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

I understand that the reason the gentleman from New York urges to sustain his point made against the motion is that the rule requires a bill to be on the calendar and that otherwise this motion to take up the Senate bill can not now be entertained.

Mr. Speaker, that brings us to the rule. Of course, everybody knows the twofold object of the rule. The first object is to expedite the business of the House. Now, no one will deny that this motion which I have made by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary has as its object the expediting of the business of the House.

The other reason for the rule is that the House may be informed of the subject matter covered by the motion, the nature of the bill, and the bill itself. Now, if that reason is complied with, if the House understands that, if the House can fairly infer from what has happened and from the previous action on the bill, together with reference to this bill, what is covered by the particular motion, the reason of the rule that the House should be informed has been complied with. If the reason for the rule ceases, the rule itself ceases. The complement of that is that if the reason for opposition to the rule ceases, the rule ought to be enforced.

Now, let us examine the text of this rule. It is Rule XXIV, subdivision 2:

> Business on the Speaker's table shall be disposed of as follows: Messages from the President shall be referred to the appropriate committees without debate. Reports and communications from heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner and with the same right of correction as public bills presented by Members; but House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine—

Now here is the part that is material—

> as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House.

So the test is, Is this bill substantially the same as the House bill which has heretofore been favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary? If it is, then this objection will not lie. If it is not substantially the same bill, the objection is well taken.

That brings us to the consideration of the two measures. Gentlemen are mistaken in saying that the Senate bill is not precisely the same as the House bill. With my associate, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], I have compared the text of the two, and we find that the text of these measures now on the Speaker's table and the bill passed by the House on last Saturday are identical in words, except that the Senate bill changes the caption and changes the number at the top of the bill. The title of the House bill was—

> An act to divest intoxicating liquors of their interstate-commerce character in certain cases.

The Senate bill, which we now have on the Speaker's table, is entitled—

> An act divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

Almost, but not exactly, the same title—substantially the same.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is useless for me even to suggest that the title of a bill is not a part of the law. The title of the bill is no more a part of the substance of the law than the Speaker's name is a part of his anatomy. So we can dispose of that question. And the mere numbering of the bill, the striking out of "H. R. 17593" and substituting "S. 4043," in no wise changes that feature of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, we know why the bill came to us in this particular shape. We know that when the Webb bill was offered somewhere else it required unanimous consent for it to be substituted. That unanimous consent was denied, and then another bill was amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu of the language stricken out the language of the Webb bill.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] urges this point in opposition to my motion, that the House bill as it passed the House was not the bill that was introduced by its author originally in the House. Mr. Speaker, if you carry out that process of reasoning, if you split hairs to that extent, I dare say you would never find a bill here that would escape a point of order predicated upon that ground.

I do not recall in all my service here any bill in which there was not something changed by striking out and substituting or something added or something subtracted from it. So you see the absurd position we might be in hereafter if we should adopt what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] believes to be ineluctable logic. I am glad to see the lawyers around me smile at my words. If they had read the decisions of a very high court carefully, they would find that I have appropriated the language used by a distinguished jurist.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the point made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is not well taken for the reasons I have given, and the reasons given by the gentleman from Illinois, if adopted by the Chair, would lead us into an impossible position, and an embarrassing position. It would defeat the expedition of the business of the House. It would be putting a construction upon the rule which it does not bear. The House is fully informed after three hours' debate on this particular bill last Saturday, and after full consideration of the bill as it came from the committee. So nobody can doubt but what this bill is the bill which the Committee on the Judiciary reported to this House and the precise bill that this House considered and acted on last Saturday.

There is nothing in the rule which requires that the bill of the House should be on the calendar, for the language is "a bill substantially the same as House bill already favorably reported by committee of the House." If a favorable report of the committee of the House can inform the House under this rule, how much more is the House informed by that favorable report followed by debate in the House and by action of the House? It is more than a mere report of the committee. The House has acted on it, and it is the identical bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not the proper construction to be placed on the rule that the gentleman has just read that the bill which is the substance of the one that has come over from the Senate must be at the time either in the committee or pending in the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker. I have been endeavoring to show that I did not take that view of it, but perhaps I was unfortunate in my use of language.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not that the dispute arising over the construction of this rule? There is no bill now pending in the House, either in the committee or reported from the committee, because the bill that was here has been disposed of and there is no such a bill here now.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is the gentleman through with his question?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I answered in all frankness, Mr. Speaker, by recognizing the situation in the beginning, that this bill is not now on the calendar. It passed the House last Saturday, but I was not fortunate enough to impart to the gentleman from Indiana what I believed to be the determining consideration of the question. My contention is that the bill now on the Speaker's table is identically the same as the House bill already favorably reported on the subject and which passed the House last Saturday. I do not think it is necessary that the bill be now pending on the calendar. That is a question that the Chair is called upon to decide.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose there was a controversy as to whether the Senate bill is substantially the same as the House bill. The House bill has gone from the House. How is that matter to be determined? There is nothing in the House, either in the Journal or in the official record, by which the Speaker can ascertain what the House bill was or is, unless the bill is on the calendar and in the House.

In a controversy arising, how will the Speaker determine whether the bills are substantially the same or not? After the bill has left the House, he can not refer to anything, although perhaps he might assume to do so. I ask this question in good faith.

Mr. CLAYTON. I take it that the gentleman has put his question in good faith. The gentleman is well aware of the fact that in the law there is such a thing as judicial knowledge, and I take it that the Chair and the House has a right to know something without having the paper before them all the time. We have the RECORD of last Saturday, when the Webb bill was passed, now before us, and there are prints of that bill here in the House and in the document room. I shall not admit that either the Speaker or the House itself is ignorant of the bill which passed the House Saturday last. We knew then and we know now what it was, and no kind of refinement of parliamentary law can take away from us this information, which is actually in our possession.

Are we going to admit, and is the Speaker going to admit, that we do not know what we passed last Saturday, that we solemnly debated a bill for three hours, and each one of us voted on it on a roll call, and yet the Speaker and this House are utterly ignorant of the subject matter of the bill? The suggestion is an absurdity. The Speaker knows what the bill is and this House knows what the bill is, and if the gentleman has any doubt about the bill that we passed, I beg to refresh his memory by now handing him a copy of the bill that we passed on Saturday last.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that it is not necessary to inform me as to what passed through the House. This happens to be a bill of two pages. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama would be able to determine if two bills were substantially the same, the bills consisting of 60 pages, but I doubt it.

Mr. CLAYTON. If it were an appropriation bill, I do not think I would.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not necessarily be an appropriation bill, but the only manner in which it can be determined whether the Senate bill, which is now before the House, and the House bill, which is not in the possession of the House, are the same or substantially the same would be by a comparison of the two bills, and that is of such an important character that if the original of a bill instead of being at the Clerk's desk be in the committee room, the House can not consider it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's suggestion that we do not know what the House passed, it seems to me, is begging the question, or, to use another expression that I have sometimes found in the lawbooks, it seems to me to be sticking in the bark here and not going to the real question. The Speaker knows and the House knows what the bill was that the committee favorably reported. I am not going to say that either the House or the Speaker is ignorant of events so recent as last Saturday and ignorant of measures now pending in Congress.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is the official record of Congress, the bill appears, showing upon its face that it is the House bill, appearing on page 2929 of the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama permit a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. When the Webb bill passed the House and was sent to the Senate, the House then lost jurisdiction. Members may individually know what was done, but they can not judicially or officially know it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question. What is the reason the Chair has not as good a right to find out what is in a bill as any other Member of the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is his duty to do it if he is not informed.

Mr. CULLOP. I assume the Chair individually remembers what was in the bill, but the Chair has no right as a legal proposition to take official notice of what was in the bill in order to rule on this question, because the Chair lost jurisdiction of the measure when it passed here and went to the Senate. To know a thing individually is one proposition, but it is an entirely different one to know it officially.

Let me put a case to the Chair. Suppose this had been a lawsuit and judgment had been rendered and the record signed, the case ended, and supposing when another case came into court some lawyer who wanted to introduce that record in evidence should stand up and refer to the record of the former case and say the court knew what had been done in the case, the court could take no notice of such a procedure——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, is this the question that the gentleman is asking?

Mr. CULLOP. I am answering the Speaker's question. The court would have no right to say that he judicially remembered what had been done and would consider that as evidence in the case, but the record itself would have to be introduced. This bill was passed and sent from the House to the Senate. That disposed of it here. This House lost jurisdiction. It passed into the records of the House.

The bill went out of the House, and under this rule there is no such bill pending here. Some one has suggested that it has come back. True; but when it came back, there was no such bill pending in this House, and under the rule it had to be referred to the committee, and it was no longer a pending measure here, which could be substituted for the bill that had been introduced in the House, and I take it that this is the same as the legal proposition I laid down would be in a court of record—that the court can take no judicial notice of a case that has been disposed of in court, though it is a part of a record of his court and the court remembers all about it. That would not suffice, and the fact that we can look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to see what was done does not help the matter in the least for the purpose for which it is contended. Now, does the rule read here as authority give such power to the Speaker as is contended by those who invoke it for that purpose? I contend it does not, and if it does I assert it is a very dangerous rule and may be invoked as an instrument of great harm and injustice if expediency should require it. The proper construction of that rule, I contend, is that where a bill passes the Senate as a Senate bill, although it may contain the exact language of a bill that has passed the House, when the measure comes to this House, if no such bill is pending on any of the calendars of the House, it can not be taken from the Speaker's table and passed without suspending the rule which refers it to a committee, but must be referred to the proper committee and be reported out of the committee. This is required in order for the House to have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error in thinking that the rule requires that the bill shall be pending.

It is sufficient compliance with the rule if it be a bill substantially the same as the House bill that is favorably reported by a committee of the House, and when once you determine that question in the affirmative you answer all the arguments made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] in his criticism on this motion.

Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen on last Saturday urged constitutional objections against this bill, and some of them now invoke parliamentary law to delay or defeat its passage. I hope that common sense and a correct interpretation of parliamentary law will now enable the House to carry out its intention expressed last Saturday in behalf of the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, regarding the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] that the House has lost jurisdiction of the House bill and the Chair has lost jurisdiction to take notice of what has been done by this House with reference to that bill, while the House has lost jurisdiction of the bill, the Chair has jurisdiction to take notice of what has been done in reference to it in this House. There is not a day passes, not a session passes, that the Chair does not take notice and act upon what the House has done upon a previous day. So much for that argument. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is entirely clear, it must be clear, that this motion complies with the spirit and letter of this rule in every particular, unless the contention made by the gentleman from Illinois and some others be correct that because the original House bill differs from the bill as proposed to be amended by the House Judiciary Committee that makes it lose this privileged status. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to direct your attention to this proposition: That in determining the status of this bill at this time it is not the original text of the bill of the House that must be taken into consideration. The only question to comply with the rule is, What did the committee favorably report? And if the answer be that they did favorably report a bill substantially similar to the Senate bill the ruling is complied with in every respect. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to a decision of former Speaker Reed, in 1890, where he construed this rule, and construed it very clearly. He says——

The SPEAKER. What section is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. LENROOT. Section 3100, last paragraph, volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, page 166. He says:

There are three safeguards. First, that it—has been favorably reported in substance by a committee of the House.

Namely, the Senate bill—

Now, everyone must concede that has been complied with in this case and that the Judiciary Committee did report not only substantially the Senate bill but identically the Senate bill. That is one of the requisites to give the bill a privileged status.

Second, that it is not a bill that is required under our rules to be considered as in the Committee of the Whole.

It is conceded that that has been complied with.

And, third, that the committee asks for its consideration.

So, Mr. Speaker, with the proposition that it is the favorable recommendation of the committee that determines the status and not the original text of the bill, whether this rule be construed liberally or whether it be construed strictly, the motion is within the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. This question divides itself into two parts. One is whether the status of this bill brings it within the rule, and the rule, which has been read three or four times, provides:

But House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine—

Of course that is not this case—

as may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already favorably reported by a committee of the House, and not required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole, be disposed of in the same manner on motion directed to be made by such committee.

The second division of this question is whether or not these two bills are substantially the same. The rules of the House are intended to expedite the transaction of business instead of being intended for the purpose of retarding the transaction of business. These two bills are not only substantially the same, but they are almost identical.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for whose mental acumen, industry, and intelligence the Chair has a great deal of respect, contends to-day that the Senate bill must be substantially identical with the bill as originaly introduced. On the 9th day of August, 1912, a question a good deal like this arose, and Mr. MANN, on page 10604 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, said:

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill on the Speaker's table (S. 6453) is not similar to the House bill on the calendar, and that the House bill on the House Calendar is on the improper calendar, and should be on the Union Calendar, and hence it is not in order to take this bill from the Speaker's table at all.

Of course the last part does not apply.

The SPEAKER. The second objection could be very easily remedied, but the first, if it turns out to be correct, can not.

Mr. MANN. The second could not either, Mr. Speaker, if the bill is improperly on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That could be very easily remedied, but the first objection can not be, if it turns out to be the fact.

Mr. MANN. The second objection might be remedied by transferring the bill from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar, but that would not permit this bill to be taken up.

The SPEAKER. Wherein does this bill differ from the House bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am about to call it to the attention of the Speaker. This bill coming from the Senate is similar to a bill which was introduced in the House and which was reported to the House with a number of amendments. This bill does not contain the amendments recommended by the Naval Committee on the House bill. I contend that, under the rule, if a bill is introduced in the House and the committee recommends a lot of amendments which changes to a large extent the bill, and that then the Senate passes a bill like the original bill, without the amendments, it is not a bill similar to the bill on the House Calendar.

And the Chair sustained the gentleman's contention that day.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the argument I just made was not made without the knowledge of the decision of the Chair, which has just been reread. But what I endeavored to point out awhile ago was that there was an amendment adding something to the bill, which would have sent the bill to the Union Calendar. Here is something endeavoring to detract from the original bill. My contention, then and now, is that if it is dissimilar as introduced or as proposed to be amended by the addition of new matter, then it is not a substantially similar bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if this Senate bill is not verbatim, with the small difference in the title which the Chair pointed out, the very bill that was debated here on last Saturday for three mortal hours and no debate hinged on those amendments. Neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] nor the Chair has to quit exercising the faculty of memory to consider one of these points of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair asked me the question, I would say the bill is not substantially similar. I think the Chair has not examined the House bill, from which the gentleman form Alabama was endeavoring to quote one amendment, but quoted it erroneously, and did not give the other amendment to the Chair. I think the Chair has the right to examine the House bill and quote it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did. On the second division on this question let us see if this bill is in a status justified by this rule:

As may also Senate bills substantially the same as House bills already reported by the committee of the House—

Was that bill favorably reported by a committee of the House or not? Of course, everybody knows that it was—would not be required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Of course, that does not apply.

Now, there are three things there. One is that the bills must be substantially alike. There must not be anything in them to refer to the Committee of the Whole; and there is not. It must be called up by the authority of the committee; and it is. Hence all the conditions precedent are complied with.

The contention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] that the Chair has no way of finding out what was in the bill last Saturday is untenable. In the first place, the Chair can remember what was in the House bill. We have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to see what that bill was. In addition to that, if the Chair had any cause to believe that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD had been tampered with, he could send out and get the original bill. That is still within the jurisdiction of the House and the Speaker. We do not send an original bill over to the Senate. We send a certified copy.

Mr. MANN. We send the original engrossed copy, Mr. Speaker; the only engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. There is no question but that anybody, especially if he is half as industrious as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], can verify a bill that has been passed by this House.

The rule may now not be what the rule ought to be. If a majority of Members believe that the rule ought to read, "Bills already reported by a committee of the House and on the calendar," then I submit the Committee on Rules ought to put that amendment in when the rules are revised. It is the duty of the Chair to construe the rules as he finds them.

So the points of order are overruled. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the previous question on the motion which I submitted.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is 40 minutes' debate, I believe.

The SPEAKER. If anyone wants to debate it, yes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to debate this bill now. We debated it last Saturday. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. If any gentlemen want to debate this bill on either side, there will be 20 minutes allowed to those against the bill and 20 minutes to those for it. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 26680) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. WETMORE, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FERRIS, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CARTER, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

INVESTIGATION OF FINANCIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 519 (H. Rept. 1508).

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the Committee on Banking and Currency in making the investigation authorized by House resolution 429, as amended by House resolution 504, to an amount not exceeding $25,000, in addition to that heretofore authorized by House resolution 465, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by the said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to authorize what is known as the Pujo committee to continue its investigation. By a resolution previously adopted that committee was authorized to make an expenditure of not exceeding $25,000. The purpose of this present resolution is to increase the amount of that expenditure.

Up to the present time there has been expended by that committee not quite $20,000. According to the estimates that have been submitted by the committee, it is necessary to have to complete their work an amount aggregating about $60,000, or $35,000 additional.

There is a committee amendment pending asking for an increase of this $25,000 to $35,000, making the total amount that will be authorized for expenditure by this committee $60,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has any expense been incurred in excess of the $25,000?

Mr. LLOYD. No bills have been allowed by the Committee on Accounts in excess of the $25,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has any expenditure or obligation been incurred in excess of the $25,000 authorized by the House?

Mr. LLOYD. That must be answered by the committee itself. I yield to the chairman of it [Mr. PUJO] to answer the question.

Mr. PUJO. The chairman of the committee is here present, and will be pleased to answer questions that may be propounded in reference to the work of the committee and the additional appropriation requested by this resolution.

Mr. LLOYD. In order that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may have an opportunity to propound the questions which he desires to propound to the chairman of that committee, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO], the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PUJO] is recognized for 10 minutes, in order to give the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] an opportunity to catechise him. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana whether any obligations have been incurred in excess of the $25,000 authorized by the House.

Mr. PUJO. No legal obligation has been incurred in excess of the amount set aside to make this investigation authorized by the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know that no legal obligation has been incurred, because the gentleman's committee can not incur any obligation legally in excess of the $25,000.

Mr. PUJO. But obligations have been tentatively incurred for the purpose of making this investigation and reporting to Congress the result of the work of the committee during this session, in an amount approximating $29,000, in addition to the $22,000 already spent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mind stating to the House how the money expended has already been disbursed and what these tentative obligations are?

Mr. PUJO. Not in the slightest. The expenses incident to procuring bank returns, addressed to the various banks throughout the United States when the investigation was first authorized by this House, approximate $3,300, covering the preparation of forms, the mailing of them, the clerical force necessary to audit these returns, classify them, and such other work as is usually incident to assembling statistics of that nature. For supervising this general work, commencing last April and continuing until the present time, the expense of the clerical force is $3,300.

For supplies and equipment, $137.50.

For the work of experts in compiling statistics running through books of reference, authorized financial publications and publications of that kind, for the purpose of furnishing the committee with what is known as interlocking directorates, approximately $3,500.

The expenses of the committee for holding hearings in the city of New York last June, including railroad fare and other expenses, June 6, 7, 11, 12, and 13, were $1,051.60.

Expenses incident to serving subpœnas by the office of the Sergeant at Arms have been $1,061.

The expenses incident to the appearance of witnesses before the committee in Washington have been $2,119.25.

To Dr. Richardson, for a trip to Miami, Fla., to examine the condition of Mr. William Rockefeller, $2,561.16.

Expenses incident to mailing hearings, $42.50.

Expenses incident to indexing hearings, $160.

At the conclusion of this explanation I will file a tabulation, so that the itemized statement will appear in the RECORD.

The estimated expenses which the committee will have to pay in carrying out the instructions of this House to make an intelligent investigation and report the results of its work to the House of Representatives are as follows:

NOTE.—This estimate does not include expenses of trip incident to the taking of Mr. Rockefeller's testimony; expenses of Mr. Farrar, who was of counsel of the committee; expenses of Mr. Untermyer; and other minor expenses.

Now, if there are any further questions by the gentleman from New York or anyone else, I will give them such information as I may be possessed of.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUJO. Certainly.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I notice that the doctor's bill was $2,561. What service did he perform?

Mr. PUJO. Dr. C. W. Richardson, a throat specialist, of the city of Washington, by authority of the committee, was employed to go down and make an examination of Mr. Rockefeller as to his health. He charged $500 a day and his actual expenses. He reported to the committee and presented his bill, which was audited and the warrant issued.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Did it take him five days to determine Mr. Rockefeller's condition?

Mr. PUJO. He had to go to Miami, Fla.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And that would take him how long?

Mr. PUJO. It took him two days to go, and, I presume, two days to come back.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Two days to go down?

Mr. PUJO. I think so; and two days to come back. That sum includes the railroad fare and hotel bills, and the bill is sworn to and is on file in the office of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to say that I thought it was an excessive bill for an examination that would perhaps take half an hour or perhaps less.

Mr. PUJO. The examination proper took only one hour, but he had to go to Miami and there make the examination. In that connection I will say that a request was made that he should be sent to Nassau, Bahama Islands, but the chairman of the committee declined to accede to that request.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Did the committee consider the employment of any other physician?

Mr. PUJO. No, sir; not to my knowledge.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PUJO. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I notice that there is $1,000 for the Sergeant at Arms' expenses—undoubtedly in summoning Mr. Rockefeller. There is also $2,500 for a doctor to go and see Mr. Rockefeller. How does it come that the Sergeant at Arms did not serve him with a subpœna?

Mr. PUJO. The subpœna issued last June for Mr. Rockefeller to appear as a witness, but service was not had upon him. As the time came near when it was desired to obtain his testimony the Sergeant at Arms was instructed to make service upon him, and finally service was accepted by counsel for Mr. Rockefeller in the city of New York. The subpœna upon which service had been accepted was returnable the 13th of January. It was claimed that Mr. Rockefeller could not report at that time, and so it was found necessary to send a physician to satisfy the committee as to his condition.

Mr. RAKER. As a matter of fact, the Sergeant at Arms did not have him corralled at his mansion in New York?

Mr. PUJO. That is a disputed fact. I think he was there at the time.

Mr. RAKER. It seems as though the House ought to know that if, as a matter of fact, a rich man, one with the wealth of that man, can come, through his attorney, and say they will accept service when the committee must have known and the attorney must know that the acceptance of service by an attorney amounted to absolutely nothing. The committee would not treat an ordinary man that way under ordinary circumstances. It seemed to me peculiar when I read it that this great committee with its attorneys would accept service on Mr. Rockefeller through an attorney for a witness bidding him to appear before them and then let him go to the South Seas and send a doctor down there at an expense of $2,500 to examine him. They would not do it to anybody else. I am not criticizing the committee or any of its members, but it just seems strange to me.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is entirely in error in his premise as to the law, and he is entirely in error in his premise as to the fact. Acceptance of service could be made for any witness before the committee, be he rich or poor.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PUJO. Wait a moment; not now. The committee, and, I dare say, its counsel did not know where Mr. Rockefeller was when service was accepted. I do not suppose the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] knew. If so, it was his duty to inform the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Would the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PUJO. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not intend to state that under the law of any State or of this House an attorney can accept service for a witness and the attorney can bind that witness to appear, which would give the House authority to punish him for contempt if he did not appear?

Mr. PUJO. Unquestionably I do.

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely the law is to the contrary. It requires personal service.

Mr. PUJO. Let the gentleman show me a decision to the contrary ever rendered in the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that to spend this money for the purpose of permitting this man to get out of the jurisdiction is not a very proper way to spend the people's money.

Mr. PUJO. The gentleman is drawing on his own imagination and attributing motives that never existed, either as to the members of the committee or the chairman of the committee, in saying that service was accepted to permit Mr. Rockefeller to get out of the jurisdiction of the committee, or of the United States. On the contrary, the chairman of this committee insisted that he should come back to the United States and obey the mandate of Congress in so far as submitting himself to examination.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield me some time.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. PUJO. I will be glad to answer any question the gentleman from Illinois desires to ask me.

Mr. MANN. I did not desire to ask the gentleman any question.

Mr. PUJO. I do not want any more time myself.

Mr. LLOYD. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want?

Mr. MANN. Ten minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that in the opinion of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and possibly the opinion of some other Members of the House, and probably of some other people in the country, the committee ought to have hanged Mr. Rockefeller offhand without any further consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. For what?

Mr. RAKER. For a question.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Would not the gentleman say that Mr. Rockefeller should be treated just like any other man when a subpœna was served on him?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but he was not. If Mr. Rockefeller had not been Mr. Rockefeller—a rich man—neither the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] nor anyone else would have tried to take his testimony at the risk of his life. [Applause.] It was only because he was rich—richer than we are—that he we pursued through feelings of personal animosity.

Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that this committee was authorized to make investigations with a limit of cost of $25,000, to be paid out of the contingent fund. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri whether I am correct in that?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; the limit was $25,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have a good many statutes on the books in reference to expenditures of appropriations by administrative officers and the incurring of obligations in addition to the appropriations. Only last year this House inserted two provisions in a bill not wholly covering the question of appropriations, but partly covering the question of expenditures. One of them reads in this way:

Any person knowingly violating the provisions of this section shall be summarily removed from office, and may also, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

The next section of the bill, covering the same and similar matter, provides:

Any person violating section 4 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved August 5, 1882, shall be summarily removed from office, and may also, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year.

We have a somewhat similar provision in reference to the expenditure of appropriations by the monthly theory. We are very careful in making laws and providing penalties for the violation thereof, as to what the executive departments shall do about incurring obligations contrary to law, and when our own committees do the very thing for which we would send a man to the penitentiary if he were an administrative officer, we condone the offense and pay the bill.

It is little enough that we do not apply a penalty to a committee which incurs an obligation and violates the law. This committee had no authority to incur a single obligation beyond the $25,000 authorized, and when it did that it violated the law, and instead of being punished, as it ought to be, it asks us to pay these exorbitant and outrageous bills, which ought never to have been incurred in the first place. Oh, we have heard a great deal about economy. We have heard a great deal about how a Democratic House—a Democratic Congress—was going to reduce appropriations. Here is an investigation of no value which cost, as gentlemen now say, $60,000. Sixty thousand dollars thrown away! Economy! Everywhere the appropriations are piling up. The naval appropriation bill will carry over a century and a half of money—a hundred and fifty-odd million dollars—every appropriation bill reaching over the limit! Economy, with no management on that side of the House [laughter]; with no organization on that side of the House; a disorganized mob [laughter and applause on the Republican side] in control of the legislation of this House, piling up the appropriation bills and condoning the offense of an investigating committee when it violates the law by incurring obligations which it had no right to incur. I hope we may have a return to economy, to some idea of proper legislation, and to the Members of Congress living up to the law themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], a member of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want for just a moment to call the attention of the House to the attitude of the Committee on Accounts, or at least one member of it, with reference to the expenditures for investigating committees of this House. The Congress authorized an investigation of the so-called Money Trust, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and his side of the House voted for it. Your Committee on Accounts understood that this limit of cost was to be $25,000. It is impossible, under the rules governing your instructions, for the Committee on Accounts to control that expenditure. For instance, if Mr. PUJO and his committee come to the conclusion that a certain amount of money is to be expended for a certain purpose, they immediately arrange to expend that money, and your Committee on Accounts does not know anything about it until the bills are sent in, and we must either pay them or repudiate what a committee of this House has already done. I myself am not in favor of these continuous expenditures allowed by the House, but when a committee comes into the Committee on Accounts and says, "We have spent the money you have allowed us; we have contracted these obligations on the part of the House of Representatives and the Congress under your direction," what is your Committee on Accounts to do? Either to repudiate what the committee has done or else bring in a resolution and ask the Congress to give the amount that has already been contracted for. When this matter was submitted to the Committee on Accounts Mr. PUJO gave the committee the information there that he has given this House this afternoon. There was nothing for us to do except to either repudiate what the committee had done or report a resolution into the House and ask the Congress to give him the $35,000.

Now, when you make your appropriations and authorizations, you must either give your Committee on Accounts the authority to veto every contract made by one of these investigating committees or we are absolutely helpless to protect the contingent fund, and it is impossible to do that unless we summons the committee of the House that is making the investigation before the Committee on Accounts, and instruct them by saying, "Gentlemen, before you enter into any contract, before you make any arrangement to make this investigation, you must submit your estimates, plans, and specifications to the Committee on Accounts." I undertook to do that in the first instance, and before I got far I had two or three gentlemen of this House passing by me without speaking [laughter], saying by such action, "I am going to take care of the Treasury. I am as capable of taking care of it as you are, and I do not want you or the Committee on Accounts viséing or auditing beforehand what I am going to do." The result was I concluded I had better wait, and I have waited. There have been only one or two instances in this House but what a committee on investigation has gone beyond what Congress originally permitted them to do. Now, that is the condition, and there ought to be, there is no question in my mind, some manner, some way by which when this House passes a resolution for investigation it may know the limit, and before a single dollar is contracted in excess of that limit they must come back to this House and say, "We have not got sufficient money, you must give us more money in order to complete the work you have placed in our hands," rather than complete the work and then come to your Committee on Accounts and put them in the attitude of either having to report a resolution or repudiate the debt.

Mr. MANN. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Accounts recommended, and we passed, an authorization limiting the amount of expenses that the Committee on Banking and Currency could incur to $25,000?

Mr. GARNER. It is.

Mr. MANN. Did they have any authority under the law to incur any other obligation?

Mr. GARNER. I do not know, unless it would be to imply authority to the fact that Congress had commissioned them to do certain work.

Mr. MANN. Was it not commissioned under the limitation of $25,000?

Mr. GARNER. They were commissioned, and my only criticism is that when a committee is commissioned to do this specific work and the appropriation is not sufficient, it is the duty of the committee to come back to the House itself and ask the House to give them an additional appropriation to carry out what they are authorized to do.

Mr. MANN. Is it not the duty of the committee to do that and to come to the House and ask for it before they have incurred an indebtedness of over $25,000?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Of course the gentleman knows the familiar rule of law that where an agent exceeds his authority and incurs obligations the obligations incurred do not bind the principal at all, but do bind the agent. And a person dealing with this committee knew that it got its authority from the House of Representatives and could very easily have ascertained under what authority it was acting.

Mr. GARNER. That simply emphasizes the thoughts that I have already indicated. In this particular instance I disagree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the value of this work. I do not believe there was ever $60,000 spent by any Congress on the face of the earth that will do the good that has been done by this committee in investigating the Money Trust. I hear gentlemen say that no good has been accomplished. This much has been accomplished: We have put in form of affidavits testimony of men concerning conditions that have been existing in our minds for a number of years, and have got the information upon which we hope to pass intelligent legislation later on.

Mr. MANN. But you will not.

Mr. GARNER. I say, then, that no $60,000 could be spent for a better purpose. I am saying now what ought to be the future course of an investigating committee, and that is, when they have a limit placed upon them, they should come back to Congress before they exceed that limit; and we should require in the certificate not only the chairman's name, but it should be by authority of his committee, which means a majority of them. But any man who has ever been on that committee and has had any observation of its work knows that it is a physical impossibility for its members to meet there as a committee and audit each one of these items, and the result is that we trust to the chairman [Mr. LLOYD] to look after that matter.

I simply wanted to call the attention of the House at this time to the fact that in the future the chairmen of committees conducting investigations ought to come back to the House and ask that they be given further funds with which to complete their work. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. I ask that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] give me two minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES], a member of the committee, two minutes.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Accounts I voted against this resolution, and I did so because I thought the Committee on Banking and Currency was exceeding its authority by going over the country playing horse with William Rockefeller. I thought this was a needless expenditure of the people's money, and I thought it was not necessary to do this in order to get at the facts that this committee was appointed to ascertain, as an eminent physician had already given this information to the committee, and I still think so.

The only strong argument that was used for the passage of this resolution before the Committee on Accounts was that this expenditure was not half as much as what some other committees had expended in doing not as much work.

Now, I differ with my colleague on the committee [Mr. GARNER] in his idea that it was not within the power of the Committee on Accounts to have turned down this resolution. I think the Committee on Accounts should have turned down this resolution and should not have brought it in for the payment of this money, and thus teach the Members of this House and members of these junketing committees that they must keep within the limits of the amounts that are allowed by this House for their expenditure. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The gentleman has 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote for this resolution. It is useless for committees of this House to spend all the session in attempting to impress upon the administrative officers of the Government that when they are authorized to conduct a service within a certain sum they must do so and so arrange their service as to conduct it in that way when committees authorized by the House to do a specific service within a specific sum absolutely disregard the order of the House and make arrangements to spend such sums as they please.

I believe that there is in the contingent fund of the House to-day, or there was about a week ago, $100, and there are requests pending for $100,000 to supply the deficiencies for the balance of this fiscal year.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has not overexaggerated the picture as to what is likely to happen at this session of Congress. No one can tell just how much the appropriations at this session will be, but I think it is a conservative estimate to say, Mr. Speaker, that they will far exceed the appropriations that have been made at any session in the history of the Government.

I have done my part and have done my best in some way to curtail the expenditures; not to interfere with the legitimate functions and services of the Government, but to stop the expenditure of public moneys to gratify every whim and to please every fancy, either of individuals or of Members. Everyone seems possessed, however, of a determination to obtain moneys to maintain and extend that particular branch of the public service in which he or his constituents is particularly interested and then to make fragmentary, spasmodic efforts to save in some other direction in which neither he nor his constituents will be affected.

Such a condition can not long continue. I understand that the bills reported at this session of Congress will probably provide for the expenditure of the $100,000,000 which it is anticipated will be raised by an income tax. It reminds me somewhat of an incident that occurred in the Committee on Appropriations when $27,000 was requested for a certain public service in anticipation of the enactment of some legislation at the next session of Congress.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that unless this side of the House wakes up to a sense of its responsibility, not only will the appropriations be grossly extravagant, but they will amount to so much that talk of a revision downward of the tariff will be the most hollow mockery. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri still has 17 minutes.

Mr. LLOYD. The Committee on Accounts, Mr. Speaker, has endeavored as faithfully as any committee in this House to discharge its duty, and anything that has been said this afternoon with reference to overlapping and extending beyond the authorization that is allowed to committees does not in any way apply to the Committee on Accounts. This committee has from time to time done all in its power to keep down the expenditures made from the contingent fund, and I think those of you who have watched the work of this committee must say that we have done more to curb the incidental expenses of this House than any committee has done which is connected with this House. Ours is a small work, but if you knew the number of propositions that we have turned down, the number of efforts that have been made to raid this fund, and if you stopped to consider what we have done in undertaking to curb the expenses of the House, you would feel like commending this committee.

I want to say this, with reference to the expenditures that have been made in investigations: In some instances they have gone beyond the authorization in making contracts. In this particular case it may be that they have gone beyond the limit of expenditure in authorizing contracts. But I am perfectly safe in making this statement: That never in the history of the American Congress has there been as much work done in the way of investigation for as little money as has been done during this Congress. Why, think of it, this money investigation, running into all manner of inquiries, necessitated much of expenditure that nobody could have supposed in advance was necessary to be made. Yet this total expenditure is not to exceed $60,000. Do you remember an immigration commission that we had a short time back? Do you remember the work that they did? I am safe in making the statement that this committee has accomplished as much for the American people as did the immigration commission, and it has only cost about one-tenth as much.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that immediately after this $25,000 was promised, this committee made an agreement of some sort with Mr. Untermyer which involved a large fee?

Mr. LLOYD. Do you mean the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not know. I suppose they did, because he has been at work for a considerable length of time; but the Accounts Committee did not do it.

Mr. MANN. Nobody is criticizing the Accounts Committee. We understand the position of that committee with reference to the matter.

Mr. LLOYD. As far as Mr. Untermyer is concerned, when it was first suggested that he be employed, I personally was opposed to it. I said time and again that I did not believe it was wise to employ Mr. Untermyer; but I do want to say that since he has been employed he has rendered a splendid service, and in my judgment has earned every dollar of the $15,000 that it is proposed to give him.

Mr. MANN. I regret that I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Much will depend, in my vote on this resolution, on whether or not Mr. Untermyer has had that $15,000 paid to him.

Mr. LLOYD. He has not had the $15,000 paid to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, unless somebody else wishes to be heard, I move to amend the resolution by striking out "twenty-five" in line 4, and inserting "thirty-five"; and I move the previous question on the resolution and the amendment to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question on the resolution and amendment to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 4, by striking out the word "twenty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-five."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LLOYD. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 54.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. LLOYD and Mr. MANN.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 55.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and forty-three Members, not a quorum, present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 117, answered "present" 13, not voting 123, as follows:

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 18425. An act for the relief of Simon Nager;

H. R. 16450. An act to punish the unlawful breaking of seals of railroad cars containing interstate or foreign shipments, the unlawful entering of such cars, the stealing of freight and express packages or baggage or articles in process of transportation in interstate shipment, and the felonious asportation of such freight or express packages or baggage or articles therefrom into another district of the United States, and the felonious possession or reception of the same; and

H. R. 28186. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 8035. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 28699) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill. Pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ascertain from the gentleman how late he intends to keep the House to-night?

Mr. HAY. I do not think it will be more than half an hour. I think we can get through the bill in that time.

Mr. MANN. I think that is likely, but can not we have some definite time set?

Mr. HAY. I would not stay after half past 6 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill, with Mr. GRAHAM in the chair.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one professor of law (lieutenant colonel), in addition to pay as major, $500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A good many gentlemen are making inquiries about to-morrow. I do not know just how long it is likely to take to count the electoral vote, but as I understand the resolution which was passed, it provides that the Senate shall come to the House to-morrow at 10 minutes to 1 o'clock, at which time every Member of the House in the city ought to be in the Chamber.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would state that four years ago the counting of the electoral vote was concluded at 1 o'clock and 43 minutes, so that it took a little less than an hour.

The Clerk read as follows:

For extra pay of three teamsters (artillerymen), at 30 cents each per day, $383.25.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend by striking out the figures "30" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "35." That was a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 8, line 24, by striking out the figures "30" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "35."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF CIVILIANS.

For pay of one teacher of music, $1,700.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice this item is for pay of one teacher of music, $1,700. Is that the band instructor or the organist at the chapel?

Mr. HAY. He is not the organist. The organist is paid $1,200.

Mr. MILLER. Is that in a separate item?

Mr. HAY. That is in a separate item. The gentleman will find the item further along in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I thought it was in a separate item in last year's bill, but I had not been able to discover it.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will find that on page 11, line 12.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of chapel organist and choirmaster, $1,200.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$1,200" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,800."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will withhold his point of order for a moment.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MILLER. Three or four minutes.

Mr. HAY. Very well. I will reserve the point of order for a moment or two.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I acknowledge that this is subject to a point of order, because this is an increase in the salary, but I very much hope that the gentleman in charge of the bill will not find it necessary to insist upon his point of order. The present organist at the chapel is undoubtedly one of the most skilled organists in this country who has ever touched his fingers to the keys of such an instrument.

He is there not because of the amount of the salary that he gets, but because of his liking to be in that part of the country and that particular place, and he is willing to stay, as I understand it, providing that he can have really enough to live on. I notice a clerk to treasurer and various subordinate employees carried in this bill are getting as high as $1,800. It does not seem to me that the Government of the United States ought to expect a man of his skill and standing to continue in the work that he is now doing at a salary not sufficient to enable him to live on.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know that the amount suggested by the commandant was only $1,700?

Mr. MILLER. Well, I am willing to make it $1,700, instead of $1,800. I will say, Mr. Chairman, further, that, as other Members have, I have visited the academy at West Point. I think the one thing about that institution that commends itself in the highest terms above all others is that beautiful chapel, not because it cost a large sum of money, but because of the exquisite taste of its architectural arrangement, and the finest feature of the chapel is the organ, and the finest part of the organ is the organist. It certainly is not an ornamental part of the course of instruction at West Point, but it is of the utmost importance that these cadets have good music, music of this character, in connection with their devotional exercises and in connection with their work at West Point. And, therefore, I certainly trust that the gentleman from Virginia will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that the committee considered this item very carefully, and we concluded that we ought not to raise the salary of this particular employee. I therefore am constrained to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia insisting on the point of order, the point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery, namely: Blank books, paper, envelopes, quills, steel pens, rubbers, erasers, pencils, mucilage, wax, wafers, folders, fasteners, rulers, files, ink, inkstands, typewriters, typewriting supplies, office furniture, penholders, tape, desk knives, blotting pads, and rubber bands, $2,500.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is the idea of including the word "quills" in this item?

Mr. HAY. I can only say to the gentleman that the word "quills" has been included in that item for a great many years, ever since I have known the item. If they do not buy any quills it does not cost any more.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman understand they do not buy the quills?

Mr. HAY. I do not understand that they do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the chairman of the committee will permit me, the statement was made that they do not, that the word is preserved in the item as a tradition more than anything else. It is an old thing, dating from the beginning of the academy.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 28699, the Military Academy appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same with an amendment with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISPENSING WITH PROCEEDINGS UNDER CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings in order to-morrow, under the rule, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that proceedings in order to-morrow be dispensed with.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for half a minute? The Chair will state that there are some Members who have not been here when the counting of the electoral vote takes place. The arrangement and rule is that a sufficient number of seats on the right-hand side of the Speaker be vacated and chairs are put around here to accommodate the Members. The Senate sits over here, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested, they come over here at 10 minutes to 1 o'clock. The Vice President presides, the Speaker sitting by him. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, February 12, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill. I ask that it may be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "otherwise," in line 18, page 2, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That if at any time said Connecticut River Co. or its assigns shall be owned or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that it shall form a part of or in any way effect any combination or be in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, or enter into any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the production, development, generation, transmission, or sale of any power or electrical energy, then the permit herein granted may be forfeited and canceled by the Secretary of War through appropriate proceedings instituted for that purpose in the courts of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock and 30 minutes having arrived, the Senate, under the previous order made, will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to take part in the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Senate, preceded by the President pro tempore, the Secretary, and the Sergeant at Arms, thereupon proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of participating in the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., and the President pro tempore resumed the chair.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, one of the tellers appointed on behalf of the Senate in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses to ascertain the result of the election for President and Vice President of the United States, said:

Mr. President, the tellers on the part of the Senate submit the following report as the result of the ascertainment and counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1913, and ask that the report may be entered upon the Journal of the Senate without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The state of the vote for President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate pro tempore, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 531, of which a majority is 266.

Woodrow Wilson, of the State of New Jersey, has received for President of the United States 435 votes;

WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
JAMES E. MARTINE,
Tellers on the part of the Senate.

W. W. RUCKER,
H. OLIN YOUNG,
Tellers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there be objection, the Chair will direct that the certificates which have been read in the House of Representatives shall now be placed on the permanent files of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to present a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Oklahoma, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order. Under the unanimous-consent agreement nothing is in order except the pending bill. The Chair dislikes to make this suggestion to the Senator, but the unanimous-consent agreement confines the Senate strictly to the pending bill and to conference reports and appropriation bills.

Mr. OWEN. I was not aware of that.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26874) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, to report it with amendments. I desire to state that I will submit at a later day a report to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report presented by the Senator from South Dakota is within the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8033) to authorize the Connecticut River Co. to relocate and construct a dam across the Connecticut River above the village of Windsor Locks, in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the Senate took a recess yesterday afternoon, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was in the midst of his address upon the pending bill, and gave notice that he would proceed upon the meeting of the Senate at this time. I do not see him upon the floor, and I do not know whether any other Senator would feel at liberty, in view of the notice he gave, to interrupt his address.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, is the hour for morning business——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has been in recess and has reconvened as a part of the legislative day of yesterday. There is no morning business to-day until the pending measure shall be disposed of.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done. The Senate is now operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, and nothing can be done which will vary that in any particular.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Newlands	Smoot
Bacon	Gallinger	Oliver	Stone
Bankhead	Gamble	Overman	Sutherland
Bourne	Gardner	Page	Swanson
Brady	Gore	Percy	Thomas
Brandegee	Gronna	Perkins	Tillman
Brown	Jones	Poindexter	Townsend
Bryan	Kavanaugh	Pomerene	Warren
Burton	Kenyon	Root	Webb
Catron	La Follette	Sheppard	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Crawford	Nelson	Smith, Md.

Mr. WEBB. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is necessarily absent. I hope that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. STONE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. REED] is absent for two reasons—one because of the serious sickness of his wife, and the other because of very important business. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 49 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, up to the hour of adjournment yesterday I had discussed the pending measure from the general standpoint of the power of the Congress to enact it, and, at the same time, with reference to specific objections both fundamental in their character and practical in their operation. What I shall further say refers, as far as I am able to do so, to the application or the relation of the principle embodied in this measure to interests which are different from but which nevertheless are comprised within the general policy of conservation as that term is popularly understood and which is considered to be as broad and comprehensive as the material resources of the Nation. A process here involved and of interest to Connecticut finds its support largely in physical conditions wholly different from those characteristic of other parts of the country; yet they are defended by arguments and assertions identical with those which are employed to sustain a policy applied to the resources and the people of the West and without regard to our entirely dissimilar environment.

My active opposition to the measure is therefore prompted by my view of its effect upon the Western States and their interests. There is the danger to us in the use that will inevitably be made of this measure as a precedent for the exercise of similar authority under largely divergent conditions. In the far West conservation finds practical application on a very much larger scale than anywhere else, with the possible exception of Alaska. This is true by the very nature of things, because in the public-land States there is so much territory belonging to and under the control of the National Government.

Abundant provocation occurring in many parts of the country and covering a period of many years has been given and has justified the action of the Government in its commendable efforts to prevent monopoly of the public resources, and also to conserve those resources for the future. There can be no question, as I said yesterday, that in the practical operation of the national land laws and laws related to kindred subjects, abuses, various in their nature and enormous in their extent, have arisen, which abuses lie at the foundation of those enormous aggregations of property which have arrested public attention and which have aroused a very just and salutary public opinion, thereby spurring the Government to action designed for the protection of the people's heritage, preserving their resources, and administering the laws both in the letter and the spirit. I say the provocation has been abundant, and a wise policy of law, properly and lawfully, and I may say, popularly enforced—for such a thing is easy—would meet with the hearty support of all the people of the West, who realize more fully and as vividly as those of any other section of the country, the necessity for change in many features of our public-land laws and the abandonment of previous methods of applying them or permitting them to be applied by great interests upon their own account and without regard to the general welfare.

I am, and at all times have been, an advocate of conservation, not only as an expedient, but as essential policy. I have lived in the State which I have the honor in part to represent here for a period of more than 41 years. I have witnessed its expansion from a frontier Territory of 39,000 white inhabitants to a Commonwealth of 800,000 people, during which time many of the evils which gave birth to the conservation system—if system it may be called—have been evolved from the operation of the public-land laws and from the practices of men. Contemporaneously with the development of that great State have been the institution and the operation of abuses the absence of which would have redounded to our prosperity and to the good name of the Government. What is true, Mr. President, of my own State is doubtless true of those States which also contain within their boundaries large areas of the public lands. Hence the somewhat recent assertion by the Government of a new line of domestic policy and administration met with my enthusiastic commendation, because I recognized its necessity and applauded the fact that it had become generally recognized everywhere. I want, therefore, to disabuse the public mind of that impression, which is largely prevalent in the East, that the people of the West are radically and fundamentally opposed to all governmental regulation of its own property and resources or that it presents a solid front against all forms of conservation, desiring, on the other hand, the free and continued play of the old régime, without change or control or without regard to consequences.

It may be true, Mr. President, that this impression has for its basis a reasonable foundation, in that extremists everywhere are always loudest in their advocacy of or opposition to any given question or any given measure. For the words and the opinions of the extremists are those which furnish the basis for headlines and for exciting and attractive newspaper publications. They carry further than the more sober and less extravagant sentiments of the masses of the people, whose view is confounded with that of the radical few.

We of the West believe that we are the real conservationists of the country; we think so because, living where the abuses which the conservation policy is designed to correct or to mitigate have arisen and expanded, we can best determine their character as well as the remedies which should be applied for their extinction. It was very easy and natural for the people of the Atlantic seaboard to pass judgment upon western policy and opinion as affecting Indian affairs in the old frontier days, when there was constant strife with them upon the border. We believed then, and we still believe, that the men accustomed by contact with the Indian, familiar with his character, his requirements, and conditions, alive to the dangers ever menacing the pioneers, their wives and children, exposed to sudden and unprovoked attack, were the best judges of the traits, habits, conditions, and needs of the aborigines. But those in authority generally thought otherwise, with results not always anticipated or desirable. It is that experience derived from contact and association, from observation in the immediate atmosphere of any given condition which, after all, furnishes the best basis of education, and furnishes an equipment capable of determining the best and wisest methods of procedure designed to promote a good cause or to destroy a bad one. Living in the midst of the national domain stretching in every direction from the range of the Rocky Mountains, knowing the necessities of the people there residing, and conscious of the abuses which have crept into the general administration of the land laws, we believe that we can as well—and perhaps better—determine what is necessary or expedient to our upbuilding and conservation as can those more fortunate portions of the people occupying Commonwealths whose domains are held by private ownership.

I am conscious of the fact that it may be retorted that my point of view condemns my presumption in criticizing or attempting to criticize the justice or policy of the pending measure, which relates to a water course in the oldest portion of the Nation, and which is in no sense related to the conditions which exist in the far West.

I concede freely the justice of this view, but unfortunately, as stated before, this and kindred measures are constantly used as active instances of the governmental authority over the general question of conservation, concluding our challenges both of its legality or its wisdom, and as justifying similar or entirely different methods of procedure over all the public possessions from New England to the farther reaches of the continent. It is because of that fact that I have had the presumption to take any part whatever in this discussion. There can be no question but that the Senators from the four States directly interested in this proposed improvement are more conversant with conditions there existing than I possibly can be. There can be no question but that they can far better interpret the wants, the wishes, and the interests of their respective constituents than can I; but when a measure they advocate can be invoked to justify the enactment of one which applies to the people of my section which they and I oppose, it becomes essential to resist, because the ultimate evil is far more serious than the immediate good designed to be secured. Hence we must regard the pending bill as an integral part of a great governmental policy, comprehending and comprising universally every phase of what is called governmental conservation. If it rests upon the assumption of an authority, the exercise of which may involve serious consequences to any section of the Union, I would be remiss in the performance of a public duty if I remained passive because ignorant of the wishes or the welfare of the people of New England. The avowed purpose of all these measures of legislation, of all these enterprises, and of all these concessions is conservation of national resources for the prevention of monopoly, a term as broad as the territorial limits of the Republic and extending beyond the seas into and including our insular possessions thousands of miles away.

We of Colorado have no navigable streams either in a general or in a limited sense. The great rivers which find their way ultimately into the Mississippi Valley on the east and into the Gulf of California upon the west and southwest have their birth in the summits of the Rocky Mountains. The State of Colorado rests upon the crest of the continent. The melting snows of its mountains flow impartially toward the Pacific and the Atlantic seaboard. The streams are small in dimensions and turbulent in character. Therefore to call them, by the widest stretch of the imagination, "navigable streams" is to indulge in a poetic license that the gravity of this question would, if no other objection existed, prevent.

Notwithstanding the absence of any navigable streams within our borders, the national policy regards the waters of the State in some respects as it regards those of navigable streams; not, perhaps, in its requirements when used for the generation of electricity so much as in the direction of its use for reclamation purposes; which, of course, is one phase of the use of water for irrigation. As to hydro-electric purposes, the Government pursues in the West a method of procedure entirely opposite to that policy which prevails in the Eastern States. In the East it assumes to grant licenses for the use of the water, to which it asserts title of some sort; in the West it assumes to withdraw power sites from entry. In the one case it proposes to exact a revenue by the imposition of certain conditions upon the use of the energy in the stream under a claim of ownership, while in the other it proposes to derive a revenue by a grant of the right to use the land which it owns, the water being merely incident thereto, and justifies its conduct or policy in both instances by the same line of reasoning. So far as reclamation projects are concerned, it assumes to appropriate the water outright as a private user does, and then forbids any interference with its action on the part of later proprietors or previous ones who have not actually diverted the waters to a beneficial use.

Perhaps the most prominent and possibly the only contradiction involved in this situation is that the authority given to Congress to regulate commerce, sovereign in its character, is so applied through the interests and demands of conservation in the East that the Government must exercise power over navigation as though it was a proprietary right. Federal ownership of the national domain, on the other hand, is essentially proprietary in character, but the demands of conservation require the Government, in carrying out is policy, to regard and administer the trust as a sovereign attribute. For example, in the acquisition of water by the Government for purposes of reclamation—one of the most commendable and, in my opinion, the most commendable of all forms of conservation—the Government exercises a power which is analogous to, if indeed it is not, eminent domain, but without compensation; while in the East it never assumes authority to carry out and to enact a measure of this sort, except such as is derived from the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Something was said during the course of the discussion by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]—I do not pretend to give his exact language upon the subject—which conveyed to my mind the idea that in his opinion the Government could not under the commerce clause of the Constitution extend its control of the waters of streams not navigable in character. I referred yesterday to a question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the Senator from Ohio as to the power of Congress to invest a corporation undertaking to improve a navigable stream under Federal law with power to condemn property within the limits of the State where the grant of Congress was to be carried into operation or exercised, and I think it was in that connection that the reference of the Senator from Ohio to which I refer was made.

I think he also stated that, in his opinion, the Government could, for the purpose of making effective an authority of this kind, confer upon the agency or the contracting party the right to condemn such property as might be necessary to make it effective, of course, upon the theory that such power was necessary to effectuate the project of improving navigation. I deny broadly the power of Congress to invest a corporation, whether a creature of the State in which its operations are to be conducted or a creature of some other State doing business in the State where the business is to be conducted through the comity and courtesy of the laws of the latter State, with the right to exercise any power of eminent domain whatever. Such corporation must derive such authority from the State in which it is to be exercised, unless the process of condemnation is invoked solely to acquire property absolutely essential to the public improvement as distinguished from the private enterprise. That is to say, the power of Congress to confer such an authority must be limited to the power which Congress itself could exercise if it, instead of the agency selected, was making the improvement on its own account and at its own expense; yet it has been contended that such a power may be given to companies operating in States where similar Federal concessions have been made to the use of the waters in nonnavigable rivers, and in the State of Iowa particularly.

Now, Mr. President, what is the situation in the West as regards the operation of the laws and policy of the Government of the United States upon certain of our natural resources? I have attempted—not very clearly perhaps—to illustrate the relation which governmental authority asserts between measures of the sort now pending and other measures which are also instituted and sought to be made effective through the so-called general policy of conservation. The waters of the natural streams of the arid States—it is so provided in the constitution of our State—belong to the people thereof, subject to appropriation for beneficial uses. They do not belong to the General Government, not even where the streams traverse the public domain, except in so far as they may not have been or may not be appropriated by the citizen. They belong to the people for appropriation for beneficial uses. That constitutional declaration, Mr. President, although it has received the sanction of the National Legislature and has been expressly recognized and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, is not a grant from the Government to the people; it is merely declaratory of a condition preexisting. In the very nature of things the waters of the natural streams in an arid country must belong to the people, because otherwise it would not be habitable; otherwise there could be no population, no civilization, neither development nor conservation of natural resources.

In my school days, the geography which I studied pictured the continent west of the Missouri, almost to the Pacific Ocean, as "The Great American Desert." It was represented to the young mind of that generation as being as desolate and bleak as Sahara or the Desert of Gobi. It was uninhabited and uninhabitable, and must ever remain a space upon the map which thoroughfares might traverse, but in which human kind could not subsist. That was the natural result of the lack of complete knowledge and information as to the character of the soil and the climate of that region and the extent to which the land could be fertilized by irrigation.

But as population extended farther and farther to the west and pressed upon the resources of nature the desert disappeared and was made to blossom as the rose, through the application to its brown and bleak surfaces of the waters of the country. A common law sprang into existence, as it alway does in Anglo-Saxon communities, in harmony with the necessities of man, of the peculiarities of soil, and of climate and other conditions; and under the imperious requirements of these conditions the doctrine of riparian rights—I will not say "disappeared," because it never existed; it never could have obtained recognition under those conditions. Therefore the declarations of our constitution and of other States relating to waters were merely declaratory or confirmatory of a preexisting right as absolute and unquestioned and as necessary to human habitation as the breath of the air to human life.

Prior to the existence of an organized community, away back in the days of the administration of James Buchanan, before the Territory of Colorado had been organized, when society existed, if at all, in a fragmentary condition, without written laws, without any cohesive attributes; when every many stood for himself, and against only the common enemy, the waters were diverted from our streams and carried away from the riparian owner or occupant and utilized upon lands owned or in the possession of the man diverting the water for his essential requirements. Out in California, where the discovery of gold caused an enormous migration in 1849, the precious metal in the sands and on the mountainsides required the use of water for its separation from the other substances that it might be given to commerce and industry, thereby enriching the people everywhere. To do this required the diversion of water from the channels of the streams; and that diversion necessarily grew into a property right accruing to him who made the diversion and applied the water to a beneficial use, the latter being as absolutely essential to ownership as the act of diversion, and the two together constituting the basis of the property right.

So in 1866, on the occasion of the enactment of the first mining law, Congress expressly recognized this right, and the Supreme Court of the United States declared the statute to be a mere declaration or confirmation by Congress of a legal status already existing, and needing no such declaration for its creation or enforcement. So out of these conditions grew the necessity of ownership in the water, without reference to its origin or its natural flow, by the people of that section of the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator's opinion, in connection with the subject he is discussing, as to this proposition: Has the Senator any doubt but that a private individual may appropriate the water of a stream running by Government lands?

Mr. THOMAS. Not a particle.

Mr. BORAH. And thereby appropriate it to the individual's use, to the exclusion of the Government as a proprietor and a riparian owner?

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt whatever of it, Mr. President; the only limitation being that fixed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Rio Grande case, in One hundred and seventy-fourth United States.

Mr. BORAH. I had in mind the Rio Grande case, where Mr. Justice Brewer uses some language which to me is a little bit difficult to understand.

Mr. THOMAS. I am coming to that later on, because unfortunately the phraseology employed by that court has been utilized as the basis of an authority to control the use of our waters which can not be reconciled with the right of the citizen to divert them, there being no riparian right in the country where the diversion is made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, while the Senator is on that point, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether or not I correctly understood the Senator, and I wish to make sure. If a natural person is the riparian proprietor upon one side of a stream and the Government is the riparian proprietor of the land upon the other side, did I correctly understand the Senator to say that the Government does not have all the rights of ownership that the natural person has?

Mr. THOMAS. Not exactly that. There is no such thing as a riparian proprietor in Colorado, or in Idaho, or in Wyoming, or in Arizona in the sense that the term is used and applied here. What I said was that the Government had no title to the water running through the public domain, provided it had been or provided it should be appropriated by some user and diverted from the Government land to his own land and applied to a beneficial use.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, we are all aware of the doctrine of prior appropriation that obtains in some of the Western States, particularly the arid States. But if what the Senator has just said is his answer to the question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], then I did not understand the question asked by the Senator from Idaho. I thought I restated to the Senator from Colorado substantially the question asked by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THOMAS. No; no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is my mistake, then, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. The situation is well expressed by the Supreme Court in the case of Boquillas Co. against Curtis, a case arising in Arizona and reported in Two hundred and thirteenth United States, page 349. It sums up the law in that case with this sentence:

> The right to use water is not confined to riparian proprietors. Such a limitation would substitute accident for a rule based on economic considerations.

The ownership of the waters of the arid States, being in the people of the State and being absolute and unquestioned except in so far as the Government may interfere for purposes of controlling or improving navigation, is not subject to control, directly or indirectly, by national authority, save as decided in the case of United States v. Rio Grande Co. (174 U. S., p. 80). There the Supreme Court held, in substance, that this ownership of water is subject to two conditions. In the first place, it can not be so used as to impair the navigability of streams. The second condition is stated in the part of the opinion to which the Senator from Idaho referred. I had not intended to give the exact language, but perhaps I had better do it, as I have it here, so that there can be no question about the correctness of my statement.

I read from a document entitled "Federal Control of Water Power," on page 80. It is a citation from the Rio Grande case:

> Although this power of changing the common-law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its water, so far, at least, as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable watercourses of the country even against any State action.

The first exception or condition I will repeat:

> That in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its water, so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property.

If we may concede, for the sake of argument, that this could not be done "in the absence of specific authority from Congress," the reply is that the act of 1866 and the act of 1870, the recitals of the constitution of the State of Colorado, sanctioned by the approval of the President and of Congress, and the recognition of its validity by the Supreme Court of the United States, give abundantly the specific authority from Congress which here is declared to be essential to the exercise of the right to divert this water from Government lands.

But there is another limitation upon the condition as it is here formulated:

> A State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States * * * to the continued flow of its water, so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property.

What is "a beneficial use of the Government property"? If the Senator from Idaho files upon a homestead which is intersected by a stream of running water and obtains a patent from the Government for his filing, he gets the land; but he gets the water only if he has appropriated it under the laws of the State. And if I, prior to the patent or after the patent, and before his appropriation, file upon the water so running through that quarter section and divert it to other territory for beneficial uses, the water becomes mine, and does not pass to the Senator from Idaho by virtue of his filing or by virtue of his patent.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he means to say that the holder of the property gets his title to the water by virtue of the patent?

Mr. THOMAS. No; that is quite the contrary of what I intended to say. What passes by the patent is the land. The water is acquired by appropriation, and whoever appropriates that water owns it if he applies it to a beneficial use. Hence, my impression is that what was meant by the learned justice who wrote this opinion, and who, perhaps, was better qualified to pass upon questions like this than any of his contemporaries, was that, as far as might be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government in some scheme of reclamation, perhaps, or its devotion to the improvement, if you please, of the land bordering upon the stream through some method of its own and within its authority, that right could not be destroyed by State legislation in the absence of specific Federal authority.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Did the court probably mean that the governmental use might be in those cases in which the Government has the absolute title by dedication of land to a governmental purpose?

Mr. THOMAS. It might be.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. May not that very language mean that if the Government had such title, as in the case of a fort, for instance, or an arsenal, you might not divert from that; but could the Government itself obtain title to that water, even for its own governmental purposes, without first taking it from the stream?

Mr. THOMAS. Except by appropriation. That has been determined in a case, the name of which I can not now recall. It is mentioned in the document which I hold in my hand. The facts in the case, as I recollect them, were that the Government made an appropriation of water in connection with one of its western military posts. Afterwards the remaining water comprising the volume of the stream was appropriated and utilized by a citizen for his own purposes. The Government afterwards sought to use all the water of the stream for its own purposes, its post having outgrown the volume of its appropriation. The courts declared that it could not do this unless it condemned the right which had been acquired through the operation of the State laws by the citizen who had made and used the appropriation.

I may say that if this first exception to the extent of the title of the people to the waters of the State should be carried beyond the suggestions which I have made, and the suggestion which was also made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], its operation would come in direct conflict with a number of later decisions of the same court upon the same subject, and I think would also directly contradict the general doctrine in the Kansas-Colorado case, to which I shall refer later on. Perhaps I had better do it now, because it is germane to this part of the discussion.

The decision in the case of Kansas against Colorado is one of the great opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. To my mind it easily ranks with the most notable judicial pronouncements of that great tribunal, and as time passes, I believe that fact will be more and more recognized; perhaps I should say particularly with reference to its definition of the powers of the Government and the distinction it so clearly draws between those powers and the reserved powers of the States.

The Arkansas River has its headwaters in that part of the Rocky Mountains included within the boundaries of the State of Colorado. It runs in a southeasterly direction, crossing the western boundary line of Kansas, which is the eastern boundary line of Colorado, and continues in its course southeasterly, traversing the southerly part of the State of Kansas. That section of the Arkansas Valley within the boundaries of Colorado is one of the most productive and fruitful regions in the world. It has been populated and cultivated within the past 25 or 30 years, prior to which time it contained comparatively few settlers. It depends entirely for its prosperity and productiveness upon the application of the waters of the river to the soil, and as a consequence these waters have been appropriated several times over and made to do duty as far as is possible to the end that the area of cultivation may be as large as conditions permit.

The State of Kansas filed this bill in the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring that the appropriations in the State of Colorado and the consequent diversions of the waters of the Arkansas River resulted in great damage and injury to the people of the State of Kansas and also to the State of Kansas as a proprietor of lands bordering on the stream. It asserted the old riparian doctrine as one of the bases of its action. It also declared its right to have the waters of the stream delivered at the State line in the same volume that would flow eastward if the river and the surrounding country were still in a state of nature; in other words, that the people of the State of Colorado could not diminish the volume of that stream to the injury of the State of Kansas. This presented an issue the success of which as against the people of the State of Colorado would have resulted in the practical depopulation of four or five great agricultural counties and would have practically restored to the desert the area which had been wrested from it. As a consequence it was the most important controversy in which the State or any of its people had been involved.

The Government of the United States asked to intervene in that case upon the ground that it was the owner of a large area of land in the Arkansas Valley and its tributaries, and that it was engaged in the work of reclamation under acts of Congress, in consequence of which it asserted an interest in the waters of the stream and of the tributaries to it of such a nature and of such a character as not only to justify but to require its intervention for the protection and preservation of its own property and also as a common sovereign interested in the outcome of a very serious question at issue between two of the States of the Union and which at the same time might affect its property interests.

Testimony was taken by the respective parties to the suit for a period of nearly two years. The case was heard in the Supreme Court under suspension of the rules, whereby the time of argument was largely extended. The decision was that the State of Kansas had not proved that it had suffered any injury; that the law of riparian ownership or proprietorship had no existence in Colorado; that the Government of the United States had no such property in the running streams of the State, as it asserted, and, as a consequence, was not a party in interest. It also declared that the reclamation act of Congress was invalid because ultra vires, except in so far as it was applicable to the Territories which were under the immediate dominion of Congress.

I might, if I had the time and the Senate had the patience, read at length from this opinion. But I will ask merely the privilege of inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two or three pages of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

But it is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 367; Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 9 How., 471; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S., 324; St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S., 566; Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S. 661; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S., 371; Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co., 142 U. S., 254; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1; Water Power Co. v. Water Commissioners, 168 U. S., 349; Kean v. Calumet Canal Co., 190 U. S., 452.) In Barney v. Keokuk, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley said (p. 338):

"And since this court, in the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 id., 443, has declared that the Great Lakes and other navigable waters of the country, above as well as below the flow of the tide are, in the strictest sense, entitled to the denomination of navigable waters and amenable to the admiralty jurisdiction, there seems to be no sound reasons for adhering to the old rule as to the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such waters. It belongs to the States by their inherent sovereignty, and the United States has wisely abstained from extending (if it could extend) its survey and grants beyond the limits of high water."

In Hardin v. Jordan, supra, the same justice, after stating that the title to the shore and lands under water is in the State, added (pp. 381, 382):

"Such title being in the State, the lands are subject to State regulation and control, under the condition, however, of not interfering with the regulations which may be made by Congress with regard to public navigation and commerce. * * * Sometimes large areas so reclaimed are occupied by cities and are put to other public or private uses, State control and ownership therein being supreme, subject only to the paramount authority of Congress in making regulations of commerce and in subjecting the lands to the necessities and uses of commerce. * * * This right of the States to regulate and control the shores of its tidewaters and the land under them is the same as that which is exercised by the Crown of England. In this country the same rule has been extended to our great navigable lakes, which are treated as inland seas; and also in some of the States to navigable rivers, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and in Pennsylvania to all the permanent rivers of the States; but it depends on the law of each State to what waters and to what extent this prerogative of the State over the lands under water shall be exercised."

It may determine for itself whether the common-law rule in respect to riparian rights or that doctrine which obtains in the arid regions of the West of the appropriation of waters for the purposes of irrigation shall control. Congress can not enforce either rule upon any State. It is undoubtedly true that the early settlers brought to this country the common law of England, and that that common law throws light on the meaning and scope of the Constitution of the United States, and is also in many States expressly recognized as of controlling force in the absence of express statute. As said by Mr. Justice Gray in United States v. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S., 649, 654):

"In this, as in other respects, it must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the framers of the Constitution. (Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall., 162; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S., 417, 422; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S., 616, 624, 625; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S., 465.) The language of the Constitution, as has been well said, could not be understood without reference to the common law.

Mr. THOMAS. I may be pardoned for referring to the syllabus:

Kansas having brought in this court an original suit to restrain Colorado and certain corporations organized under its laws from diverting the water of the Arkansas River for the irrigation of lands in Colorado, thereby, as alleged, preventing the natural and customary flow of the river into Kansas and through its territory, the United States filed an intervening petition claiming a right to control the waters of the river to aid in the reclamation of arid lands. It was not claimed that the diversion of the waters tended to diminish the navigability of the river.

Held, that—

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people; and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State. Hence the intervening petition of the United States is dismissed without prejudice to any action which it may see fit to take in respect to the use of the water for maintaining or improving the navigability of the river.

I think I have read perhaps enough of the syllabus to illustrate the scope of the decision as it relates to the two fundamental questions or propositions of present interest, one being that there is no control or ownership, although the word "control" is used—perhaps because it could not be very well contended that there was ownership of a character to give the United States any standing in the courts of the country—and the other being that the right of reclamation could not rest upon any expressed power delegated to the General Government in so far as the exercise of such right be made or attempted to be made applicable to the States of the Union.

It is perhaps interesting to refer, as it is emphasized in the opinion, to the argument of counsel for the Government in this case, for it is so similar to the assertions which the extreme advocates of conservation make to justify their invasion of the powers of the States for the conservation or preservation of the natural resources. The court says:

Appreciating the force of this—

That is, of the subjects which were covered by the syllabus that I have read, and I read from page 89 of the opinion—counsel for the Government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power"—

That is, that it could reclaim lands and assert its domination over waters belonging to other people by virtue of a sovereign and inherent power—

Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the Government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power," adding, "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the State or the National Government; no legislative powers belong to a State government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that State; consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States. But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation, as a whole, which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a government of enumerated powers. That this is such a government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment.

Then the court, in a series of statements which are absolutely incontrovertible, determines that the power asserted by the counsel for the Government of the United States does not and can not exist or be maintained upon any notion of sovereign and inherent authority, and then applies it to the facts in hand.

This very matter of the reclamation of arid lands illustrates this: At the time of the adoption of the Constitution within the known and conceded limits of the United States there were no large tracts of arid land, and nothing which called for any further action than that which might be taken by the legislature of the State in which any particular tract of such land was to be found, and the Constitution therefore makes no provision for a national control of the arid regions or their reclamation. But, as our national territory has been enlarged, we have within our borders extensive tracts of arid lands which ought to be reclaimed, and it may well be that no power is adequate for their reclamation other than that of the National Government. But if no such power has been granted, none can be exercised.

It does not follow from this that the National Government is entirely powerless in respect to this matter. These arid lands are largely within the Territories—

This decision was rendered before the admission of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union—and over them, by virtue of the second paragraph of section 3 of Article IV, heretofore quoted, or by virtue of the power vested in the National Government to acquire territory by treaties. Congress has full power of legislation, subject to no restrictions other than those expressly named in the Constitution, and therefore it may legislate in respect to all arid lands within their limits. As to those lands within the limits of the States, at least of the Western States, the National Government is the most considerable owner and has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting its property. We do not mean that its legislation can override State laws in respect to the general subject of reclamation. While arid lands are to be found, mainly if not only in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same—no greater and no less than those within the limits of the original thirteen, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation.

In connection with the application of the principle of this decision to what I am about to discuss it may be well to refer to the eighth section of the reclamation act. That section was prepared, if I am correctly informed, by my distinguished predecessor in this body, Senator Teller, and was designed by him to meet a possible condition which soon developed in the application of the requirements and provisions of the statute to the objects which it was designed to accomplish. It reads:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State of Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of the water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

I can conceive of no language that could be more appropriately employed to safeguard any infraction of the laws of the State or any invasion, through the operation of the statute, of the property rights in water of the individual in the arid-land States of the West.

But let us come to the application of this law which finds justification by the same process of reasoning which is employed to justify the existence of governmental authority to enact a measure like the one under consideration.

I am told that some time ago a certain proposition relating to conservation was under discussion before the House Committee on Public Lands; that the proponents of conservation there present were confronted by this decision, and that their answer to it was that the Bureau of Forestry and the Reclamation Service had gotten far beyond this decision, as indeed they have.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator did not doubt the correctness of the statement?

Mr. THOMAS. On the contrary, I perceived its correctness, and marveled that it should have been so candidly expressed.

I may say that the policy of control of water power in our section of the country is based upon the theory that the tributaries to the Rio Grande and the Arkansas and the Missouri Rivers in Colorado are under the jurisdiction of the General Government, under its power to control navigation, because the diversion of some of the little streamlets in the Rio Grande, for example, to these beneficial purposes might so affect the flow as to interfere with navigation somewhere between the mouth of the river and its actual head of navigation, a contingency quite as liable to occur in these days when river navigation has practically disappeared as is the possibility of supporting the exercise of such a power on such a line of reasoning.

Mr. President, I hesitate to adversely criticize the reclamation policy of the Government, because it is one of the most beneficent policies, properly administered, that the national authority has ever assumed to accomplish. It means the bringing under cultivation of large areas of land which unreclaimed are of no use whatever to human kind because of the lack of water to make them productive. They possess all the elements of fertility, moisture alone excepted, and vast sums of money must be expended, if water is secured, for the purpose of making them cultivable. The Government, and the Government alone, seems to be financially able to conduct and carry out these great enterprises.

There are several schemes now in an unfinished condition in my own State and in other parts of the West. I should feel very badly to see them abandoned or interfered with, especially where they have not thus far in any manner conflicted with the saving clauses of section 8 of the act.

But it is nevertheless apparent that in continuing the exercise of this power in the States by the General Government since the Kansas-Colorado decision it has been disregarded, and the Reclamation Bureau has proceeded, nothwithstanding the decision, as it did before then, probably upon the theory that the end justifies the means. I am candid enough to confess that I would not, if I could, gratuitously interfere with them in so far as these improvements are necessary and beneficial, as practically all of them are. But the Government, in carrying out and administering the law, has gone to an extent which can find no justification in my mind, even under the most liberal construction of it that could have been made by the Supreme Court in this case in the other direction had it been sustained.

The most notable instance of this I may be pardoned for referring to. The Government is and for some years past has been engaged in constructing an enormous dam and reservoir in the southeastern portion of the State of New Mexico. It is building a structure, called the Engel Dam and Reservoir, across the Rio Grande, near the point where it becomes an international boundary between the United States and Mexico. Its purpose is to reclaim 240,000 acres of land within the boundaries, respectively, of the United States and Mexico; that is to say, there are 60,000 acres of land in Mexico, the remainder of the 240,000 acres being located in the States of Texas and New Mexico.

It is the purpose of the Government, said to be due to some treaty relation and relating to some claim of the Republic of Mexico to participation in the waters of the Rio Grande for irrigation purposes, to furnish and supply the people of that Republic with water sufficient to irrigate 60,000 acres of land.

It is, as I said, a project commendable in itself, a desirable improvement, vast in extent and in possibilities, and one which must result in great benefit to that section of the country. But it has appropriated, as an individual might attempt to appropriate, from the waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries 2,500,000 acre-feet of water for the purpose of the enterprise.

Now, 3 acre-feet of water in that section of the country is ample for every agricultural purpose; that is to say, a body of water an acre in extent and 3 feet thick furnishes sufficient moisture, climatic conditions being duly considered, to guarantee fertility. If you multiply 240,000 by 3 the result is 720,000 acre-feet, which are ample for the purposes of that enterprise. Yet the Government has seized and holds more than three times the quantity of water needed for the enterprise and which it could not use if it would.

In making these appropriations, however, the Government of the United States has invaded the property rights of the State of Colorado and filed its appropriations upon the waters of the Rio Grande and all its tributaries within the boundaries of that State upon the theory, I presume, first, that it is necessary to the enterprise; and, second, that it has the power to obtain this water as the general sovereign from any and all States which encompass the Rio Grande and its tributaries without reference to the local welfare, and also without reference, perhaps, to appropriations made by private individuals and corporations upon the same streams and the same sources of water supply which have not actually been diverted for beneficial uses.

As a consequence, it has laid an embargo upon the use of all the waters of the Rio Grande in the State of Colorado except those which had previously been appropriated and used, to the end that a dam to be constructed, if you consider the windings and meanderings of the stream, some six or seven hundred miles away and wholly within the jurisdiction of another State may be supplied with water for irrigation purposes.

Section 8 of the reclamation act has been ignored. The property of the people of the State of Colorado, guaranteed to it by the Constitution, has been practically confiscated, and some 200,000 acres of our land which could easily be made cultivable and habitable if we could use this water ourselves must continue to remain a part of the San Luis desert.

My assertion is that this is an exercise of a power wrongfully, even if it existed, and what makes it the more unbearable is that it seems to be so unnecessary, because, Mr. President, if we were permitted to conserve these waters by building reservoirs of our own and utilizing the reservoir spaces with which nature has supplied us, we could first use and then pass this volume of water farther down the reaches of the stream without serious diminution, and the amount necessary for the Eagle Reservoir enterprise would still be quite as available as it is now, this water not being, under present conditions, susceptible of use in my State at all.

What power has the Government to do this? What clause of the Constitution of the United States directly or by necessary or other implication confers upon the Reclamation Bureau the authority to invade the sovereign State of Colorado and seize upon waters belonging to it for use in a project away down in another part of the Union and entirely within the boundaries of two other States and designed, in part, for the citizens of a foreign republic? What power has the Government under any provision of the Constitution to take the waters of the State of Colorado in order that a supply may be utilized for the reclamation of 60,000 acres of land in a foreign country? What treaty stipulation between the two countries can be found to justify this course? I concede that great benefit to the good people of New Mexico and of Texas must come from the project, but I deny the right of the Government by any system of procedure that is known or recognized to be right or lawful to carry out and to effectuate such a condition at the expense and to the injury of the people of another Commonwealth without compensation or any thought of it.

We have appealed in vain to the Interior Department for relief. Under the statutes of the United States when the waters of a stream are appropriated for reservoir and irrigation or power purposes requiring the use of the public lands, a filing must be made in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and that filing must be approved. This requirement is mandatory upon that department, as we contend, if the law itself is complied with and its purposes are to be subserved. Yet since these appropriations of the Government, since this improvement has begun, the embargo is so far extended that it is impossible to obtain the approval of any filing that may be made upon waters or on reservoir sites within the basin of the Rio Grande River inside the boundary lines of the State of Colorado, so that apart from previous appropriations there is some water everywhere, but not a drop for State development.

It was demonstrated in the Kansas-Colorado case that in the early days before the settlement of that section of country the Arkansas River disappeared in the sands some 150 miles east of the western boundary of Kansas and afterwards reappeared at the surface some distance below. It was known locally as a broken river. A remarkable phase of the testimony in that case demonstrated that as a result of irrigation, the taking of the waters out of the stream and utilizing them upon the sides of the valley, created a sort of subterranean reservoir of supply for the river, in consequence of which the waters of the stream were actually increased instead of diminished. The point where the waters of the stream sank out of sight into the sands had therefore traveled eastward, reversing the general practice of humankind to go West.

But with all these physical facts in our favor, with the law of the land for our protection, the people of the San Luis Valley, to use a western expression, are "up against it." They are practically without relief unless and until the attention of the country is concentrated upon these conditions and a halt be placed upon the march of what, in my judgment, in that particular case is the reverse of conservation.

Now, I contend that the logical result of these conditions is that if it should so happen that the appropriations of water made by the General Government for this purpose should, after the improvement is completed, for any reason be found insufficient, the reclamation bureau may confiscate the waters of the State theretofore appropriated by the citizen by a reappropriation thereof and add them to the appropriations already made under the guise of their necessity for the success of the Government enterprise. Why not? Such action differs in no material respect from the appropriations hitherto made, and both may be justified, if either can be, under a general power to do whatever the requirements of the Government project may demand, albeit the Supreme Court has otherwise declared.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to inquire whether or not the river is navigable in Colorado where these waters are attempted to be appropriated by the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. I made the statement some time ago, when perhaps the Senator was out of the Chamber, that there was no such thing as a navigable stream anywhere within the limits of my State.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the question of riparian ownership enter into consideration?

Mr. THOMAS. It never has prevailed in that section; it is excluded by the laws of man and of nature.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Government has not reserved the shores of the river?

Mr. THOMAS. On the contrary, the Government ownership in the water, if it ever had any, has passed to the people of the State by the practices and common law of the State and by the express provision of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator mentioned where a bureau of the Federal Government has recalled a decision of the Supreme Court. Is there no way of getting before the court the question as to the right of the Federal Government to stop the further appropriation of water from the Rio Grande up in Colorado? If, for example, somebody went to work and erected a dam, the Government would have to stop it in some way, and that would precipitate a lawsuit of some manner, and if the Government did not contend that what it was proposing to do was because of the desire to improve or to preserve the navigability of the river, the question could be brought up fairly in some way, it seems to me.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that is a subject to which a number of leading lawyers in my State have been giving close and careful attention for some time.

If they have reached a conclusion I have not been informed of it. I know that the present session of the general assembly has appropriated or proposes to appropriate a fund, among other things, for the purpose of testing that question to the full. Of course, if we can not obtain relief from the courts we must obtain it through national action or go without it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course you can not sue the Government of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course we can not sue the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But you can make the Government of the United States sue you, or take some process against you, by just violating these orders of the bureau.

Mr. THOMAS. The Government, of course, is not the subject of a direct action. The difficulty, I think, that has presented itself to the minds of the gentlemen who are investigating the question lies in the probability that the act of the Secretary of the Interior or his subordinates in refusing to accept filings for these appropriations and reservoir sites is so far discretionary as to be beyond judicial control, and that is one of the essential conditions for immediate action. They are also considering the serious question, however—and there are some authorities, and respectable ones, in support of it—as to whether the State of Colorado or its citizens may not condemn, notwithstanding the fact that they are located upon the public domain, reservoir sites and rights of way for ditches.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But back of that is the point that if these streams are nonnavigable the United States Government as a Government has nothing to do with them, and therefore a law which would require a permit to be gotten in order to put a dam upon a nonnavigable stream, it seems to me, would be itself invalid.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's premises are correct, but his conclusion is not in practice. The Government does assert its right to have something to do with them in many ways. For example, a statement of Mr. Justice Brewer, to which I called attention a few moments ago, has been used as the basis of treating all those streams, because they are tributaries to navigable streams, as largely within the control and under the domination of Federal power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand if the Government were to come in and say we have issued these orders or we have refused these permits, which would render the Rio Grande lower down nonnavigable or might decrease its navigability, that would be all right; but if you could meet that by showing that it would not and that that was not the real object or the effect, which is the main thing, it seems to me that the decision, so far as the Senator has read it, would not apply.

Mr. THOMAS. I think so; and yet, in my judgment, the Government is quite as logical in saying that it can control these streams through the exercise of its power over navigation as in saying to the Connecticut River Co., "We will give you a franchise on the Connecticut River and the control over property in its waters that do not belong to us." The one is the outcome of the other, or rather it finds some support in the other, which, as I have previously stated, requires me to resist the passage of that measure to the extent of my ability.

There is another manner in which the Federal authorities invade this property right of the States in their waters and the right of their citizens to appropriate the same for beneficial uses, and that is by the withdrawal of power sites from entry and patent. The Government has made what I may term, perhaps with perfect justification, a wholesale withdrawal of everything that even looks like a power site bordering upon or near streams running through the public domain. Its purpose is—and from one standpoint it may be commendable; I have no doubt it is sincere and supposed to be necessary—to require those desiring to generate power to lease these sites for a term of years upon terms to be fixed by some governmental authority, and thereby derive a governmental revenue to be utilized as in its wisdom may be determined. This policy is inspired, as I understand it, not from the desire of gain, but to restrain the forces of monopolistic control, a purpose which has my entire approval.

The use of water varies. It is manifold. In our section of the Union it is absolutely essential for domestic and for irrigation purposes. These two uses are therefore placed ahead of and made superior to all others. Water may also be appropriated for mining and for manufacturing purposes, which include appropriations for power. These are not mere abstractions; they are rights created by law, which belong to all those who desire to utilize them, the primal and absolute condition to their permanency being beneficial use. One can not appropriate water and then hold it, so that others desiring to apply it beneficially may be prevented from doing so. There is only one power in the world that I know of that can do that, or which actually does do it, and that is the Government of the United States; in other words, the man who makes an appropriation of water must follow it by diversion and by application. If the Government holds a power site from entry and fixes terms for its lease, which terms must be complied with before the power that is latent in the body of the stream can be utilized and made effective, and the terms are not such as to address themselves to the business judgment or consent of the other contracting party, I contend that it is as much a deprivation of a property right existent and potential in the people as would be the actual seizure of visible property. It is conversion to a so-called public use followed by withdrawal without making due compensation. If we are entitled, under our Constitution, to make these appropriations, if the water belongs to the people of the State, and that fact is recognized, then the right to use it, when dependent upon the use of the land adjoining, is utterly destroyed just as soon as the right to use the land is withheld.

It may be said that the terms of the Government are easy to comply with, and I may concede it, but the Government reserves the right to change the condition imposed for its use whenever it sees fit; in other words, it exercises, or proposes to exercise, a power contingently, remittently at any time subject to the discretion, if you please, the prejudice, if you please, or both it may be, of some individual clothed with authority either by act of Congress or by an assertion of the right through so-called departmental regulations. The result is that the power sites of the West are practically nonusable. As a consequence the property which is potential in the stream and which may be made the subject of appropriation, as was stated by the Senator from Ohio the other day, is running to waste.

For my part, as I have said, I have no objection to the withdrawal in some respects, because my own opinion is that it is the State which should utilize and own these power sites, appropriate the power in the water, and furnish electric current as a public utility to the needs of the Commonwealth and of its people, but that can not be done by it or by anyone except under these terms and regulations, which may be as variable in time as the changes that occur in a revolving kaleidoscope. As a consequence it does not and can not attract; it necessarily must repel all business caution and foresight. Instead of conserving, Mr. President, it destroys or atrophies the resources of the Commonwealth.

Conservation certainly should not, as applied, result in confiscation. But some of the phases of its operation, as applied to the activities of the West, tends to that result, albeit its energizing principle is the same as that urged in the discussion of the Senator from Ohio—the prevention of monopoly.

I assert deliberately, Mr. President, that the methods to which I have called attention, instead of preventing, tend to promote and perpetuate monopolistic conditions in the West. Many of those who favor the continued policy of the Government in that section are precisely those who to some extent have acquired, or hope to acquire, a greater or less monopolistic control of the necessities of the day. The concern which has an enormous power plant is precisely the concern which wants to see all the power sites the use of which might create competition withdrawn from public use; the man who holds enormous stretches of splendid timber land is the loudest of all advocates of conservation as it is actually applied, not because he may believe in conservation, but because it confirms him in an advantage which he has, owing to the existing conditions when the law went into effect. I have heard of some of the largest live-stock dealers in the country who believe in the leasing system, if you please, because they are in such a position financially as to give them practically a monopoly of the leasing privilege when it shall have been extended. I know of no section of the West where monopoly has been prevented or diminished as a result of the operation in practice of the system of conservation. Believing in it as firmly as I do, Mr. President, I want to see it made operative in a proper, practical, effective, and satisfactory manner.

I spoke of the extension of timber reserves yesterday as sometimes made with the design of including an area of country where a tree never grew, and never will grow, and never can grow, and all those extensions in the interest of those owning barren stretches, whereby they were enabled to exchange them for some of the best timber land of the country. I do not charge the Forestry Bureau or anybody connected with it with being responsible for those conditions or with approving them; on the contrary, I believe that they are as sincere and as well deserving, from their standpoint, a class of men and women as exist anywhere in the country. And it is only fair to say that these extensions, for the most part, preceded the organization of the bureau. The difficulty lies in the fact that enthusiasm is confounded with practical conditions. The consequent result is a generally widespread and constantly increasing resentment against and the unpopularity of the system itself.

The Use-book, so called, of the Forestry Bureau is a book nearly as thick as the book which I hold in my hand [exhibiting]. I think it contains rules for the regulation and operation of the department covering almost every subject under the sun. Those who come in contact with these rules are those who entertain the most irritation and resentment against the policy.

I think it is a fact in human experience which can not be denied, Mr. President, that where a given policy comes in direct contact with a part of the people who unite in repudiating that policy, resent its existence, and deny its beneficial features, there is something radically wrong either with the policy itself or with the method of its operation, or with both. I hope in this instance it is the method of operation which makes it unpopular; but certain it is that the opinions of those who experience, through immediate contact, the consequences of the operation of any given policy, and the universal state of mind which is produced in consequence of it, ought to be a pretty good index of its success or the opposite. It is also the best test of the wisdom of its methods of procedure.

In the old days of carpetbagism and reconstruction the man who came in daily contact with its operation was the best judge of its character; I think that his opinion, as the result of his experiences, was worth more than that of all other men combined; and it was the collective resentment of the great people of that section of the country toward the reconstruction régime which finally aroused the national conscience, or at least so allayed its active sympathy with the system as to enable the South to rid itself of that horrible incubus. Far be it from me, Mr. President, to contrast conservation with those awful conditions, for they are as wide asunder as the poles. I merely use the illustration as applicable to the general proposition, that it is the experience of those coming into contact with and directly affected by any given policy that should ultimately determine its nature and its character, and which, if favorable, calls for its continuance, and if otherwise for its correction, either in substance or in practice. There must be, therefore, some radical defect either in the policy—and I do not think it is so much in that—or in its application—and I think there is the difficulty—which has caused the conviction everywhere throughout the public-land States that this is a policy directed against them; an unjust policy, which retards their development and interferes with their prosperity and continued growth.

I sometimes wonder how the people of Pennsylvania or of New York or of Illinois would feel if one-third of the area contained within their boundaries was segregated from occupancy, was practically controlled by a central authority substantially outside of their territory, and in the operation of which policy those intrusted with its administration came in daily contact with the people of the State, producing friction, irritation, resentment, hostility, and suspicion.

I think the people of these States by imagining such a condition can well understand, if they do not approve, that dislike, to use no harsher term, of a system which practically segregates one-third of the territory of the State from settlement and largely removes it from the operation of the local laws.

Local self-government doubtless had its origin, among other causes, in the necessity of determining from the experience of the people the benefit or injury flowing from the policies operating directly upon them, coming in daily contact with them, and touching them in their various walks of life. The Government of the United States in its so-called forest policy has segregated and withdrawn millions upon millions of acres of land, stretching from the borders of Mexico on the south to the Dominion of Canada on the north. A citizen of the United States can traverse his country through sovereign States of the Union an unbroken path, practically without any obstruction, upon reserved Government domain within the physical boundaries, but without the civil jurisdiction of the State, all of which has been done in the name and in the interest of conservation.

Of course, it is asserted that a man may go upon this territory and locate an agricultural claim, and that is true; or discover and locate a mine, and that is true; but the truth lies in the fact that such is the law, while the difficulty is that these express privileges of the statute are virtually neutralized by departmental regulation. It is not the judgment of the homesteader as to the value for agricultural purposes of his 160 acres he would file upon that governs; it is the judgment of somebody connected with the Bureau of Forestry, and whose word upon the subject is almost final.

It is not the prospector, Mr. President, who discovers a mine and locates it, who may determine whether it contains gold or silver sufficient to justify development, but an employee of the Forestry Bureau who visits it, and, after passing judgment upon it, permits or prevents the location. One can well understand what his own feelings as an American citizen would be if, with these express provisions of the law in his behalf, when he attempted to assert them, some employee of the Government should say, "By my leave, sir, alone can you make your location or perfect your entry. I will determine, and not yourself, whether the conditions exist which, under the law, give you the right to make this location."

It is the existence of these conditions which have largely modified my original views, Mr. President, upon the subject of conservation, and which I think require a halt in the direction of ultraconservation, to the end that the people of the West may continue to develop their resources and add wealth and population to the common country, and extend the area of their taxable wealth over all the territory comprised within their respective boundaries.

I have here an example of how conservation under present conditions sometimes operates. I refer to a clipping from the Saturday Evening Post, a paper published, as we all know, in the far East. It is from the issue of the 25th of January, 1913, and is so apt an illustration of conservation in practice, as contradistinguished from conservation in theory, that I shall read it into the RECORD:

SELLING GOVERNMENT TIMBER.

The Government's windmill battle against monopoly is admirably illustrated by its timber policy. Its own reports show a monopolistic situation with regard to standing timber.

An important part of the total supply, aside from that owned by the Government, is in few hands. A rise of more than 60 per cent in the price of lumber since 1897 indicates that owners of the commodity have had a leverage on the market.

Now the Government itself owns one-fifth of all the standing timber in the country, many billion feet of which are ripe for the ax and even deteriorating from overripeness. In offering this ripe timber for sale the Government "makes a close estimate of the cost of manufacturing it into boards and of the market price of the product." It then fixed a minimum selling price, based on the two foregoing factors, which will "give a fair operating profit to the purchaser on his investment, but no more."

In other words, the Government acts upon the theory that it will charge for its timber to the consumer practically all that the traffic will bear.

The words quoted are from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Obviously, under this policy the Government's timber can never be sold on the market any cheaper than the monopolized timber in private hands is sold, because the Government's price is based on the market price; and the market price, of course, is fixed—or largely controlled—by private owners of timber.

That is to say, the monopolists, which the conservation policy is designed to destroy, actually fix the price at which the Government commodity is offered to the consumers of the country. It would seem to me that in practice, therefore, the Government has become a part of, instead of an opponent of, the existing monopoly in the timber lands of the great West.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that might help the Treasury a little, but what effect does it have on the consumers of that commodity? It takes from them an extra price and puts the money into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. It does not help either, as I will proceed to show from this article:

If private owners boosted prices 50 per cent, the price of Government timber would automatically advance 50 per cent; and, though the public owns one-fifth—

The public, mind you, not the bureau—of all the standing timber of the country, it can not get lumber any cheaper than private owners offer it.

Another effect of this policy is that the Government's ripe timber is not cut, but stands and decays.

That is why I say that neither party benefits by it.

The "fair profit on his investment, but no more," which the Government offers to the timber operator, does not attract him, as is shown by the fact that it is selling only one-tenth of the timber it should sell to keep the forests in a healthy condition.

Having adopted a policy that in fact amply protects monopoly at every point, the Government then goes through a great rigmarole of restrictions and conditions designed to prevent its timber from falling into the hands of monopolists.

The whole thing beautifully illustrates our antimonopoly policy, which consists in putting a lot of words on paper and ignoring essential facts.

I heard a statement the other day while riding from my hotel to the Capitol that falls in line with the general current of this discussion. The statement was made by one gentleman to another to the effect that the Government had hitherto followed a mistaken policy in opening the mineral domain to prospecting, discovery, location, and patent; that, if it had pursued a policy of conservation from the outset, the millions of gold, of silver, of lead, and other metals wrested from the mountains by private enterprise would have constituted a revenue almost sufficient to have defrayed the expenses of the Government. Mr. President, success always attracts us; we forget misfortune as rapidly as we can, even when it is brought to our immediate notice. It is the successful mine which fixes public attention and gives to the unthinking the notion that all mining locations are valuable mining properties.

If the Government had pursued any other policy than the one which has been in existence since 1866, the result would have been few, if any, discoveries of the tremendous treasure houses of metal that have since been uncovered and utilized. That policy gave and should continue to give an incentive to the prospector, prompting him to make the search for these hidden deposits and to make locations and developments accordingly. As a consequence, it enabled the Government to sell millions upon millions of acres of domain worthless for any other purpose, and shown by development to be worthless even for that one, which it could not otherwise have disposed of; for I do not think I exaggerate, Mr. President, when I say that where one mining location becomes profitable four or five thousand remain utterly barren and worthless, bringing misfortune and disappointment instead of financial success to their owners and locators. Take, for instance, the Cripple Creek mining district. It embraces about 17,000 patented mining claims, upon which millions of dollars have been expended in the search, and the vain search, for gold. Out of 17,000 perhaps 250 have been profitable. In that small percentage were found all that constitutes that great mining district. When you consider the tremendous sums of money expended in the hope of finding gold and compare them with the yield of the few locations which have proved profitable, the balance is upon the debit side of the ledger, and the Government, not the citizen, is ahead in the process. The policy in this respect pursued in the past has been conservation, in my judgment, in the best and truest sense. It is a policy which has been practically destroyed by the regulations of the Forestry Bureau, for these have resulted, among other things, in the virtual disappearance of the prospector from the Rocky Mountain region.

This policy has practically extinguished one of the hardiest, most resolute, and daring class of citizens who ever contributed to the development and to the settlement of a mighty Nation. I think the present depression in mining circles in the Rocky Mountains is largely, if not entirely, due to the practical interdict that has been laid by a mistaken process of conservation upon the energy, the ability, the courage, and the daring of that splendid class of men who ask nothing of the country except the right to explore the public domain at their own expense and to take their chances on the result.

While upon this subject let me call attention to a kindred matter. I do it for the purpose of illustrating and enforcing the causes—and they are good ones—which lie at the basis of the opposition of the people whom I in part represent here to the general policy of the Government in this direction.

The cities of Manitou and Colorado Springs, together with the suburbs in their immediate vicinity, comprise something like fifty or sixty thousand people. They are great health resorts. In the summer season not less than 100,000 people are gathered in that section of the State. Their water supply comes from the melting snows of Pikes Peak and adjacent mountains. They are entirely dependent upon it for their supply and must guard it against all impurities affecting health, for the reputation of the two places as health resorts is one of their chief assets and one of the sources of their growth and prosperity.

Experience has proven the necessity, for sanitary reasons, to obtain jurisdiction in some method over a very considerable area of country embracing this source of water supply in order that sanitary conditions may be enforced and the purity of the water supply at all times maintained. That forms the Pikes Peak Forest Reserve, and is under the jurisdiction of that department of the Government.

I charge nothing against the sincerity and good faith of these gentlemen who are in charge and who are good citizens, who administer the law as they are required to, and who do their best to make that law effective. Yet a country which attracts consumptives necessarily must be very careful about sanitary conditions, particularly in view of the recent discoveries of medical science which have convinced us that the disease is contagious, to the end that no bad results may follow to the community. Yet a great many of these unfortunate people in the summer time go and plant their tents upon the mountain sides without hindrance from the authorities; and while these transient residences may be nothing but a menace, nevertheless they may become more than a menace to the well-being of the community unless controlled by regulations to be made and enforced by the local authorities for the common good.

A bill was presented in the House of Representatives some time ago, there passed, and afterwards reported here and passed, and is now in conference committee, giving the governments of the towns of Manitou and Colorado Springs joint jurisdiction with the Government authorities over a very considerable area of territory for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of conserving their water supply. They should have the title to this territory and exclusive control over it, but they are merely given concurrent jurisdiction for that purpose. The bill was threshed out in committees and every possible objection, substantial and otherwise, was presented to it. Finally it was enacted in such form as to meet, generally speaking, I will not say the wishes, but the consent, the passive consent, both of the governmental authorities and of the representatives of the cities mentioned. As I stated, it is now in conference as a result of the failure of the House to agree to one or two amendments that were here made to the bill.

Immediately after the conference committee was appointed this letter, written upon a letterhead of the American Forestry Association—a vice president of which is the honorable Secretary of the Interior and another the Hon. Gifford Pinchot—to the conference committee, as I suppose, was called to my attention:

AMERICAN FORESTRY ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1913.

MY DEAR SIR: May I ask your consideration of the following facts regarding a bill which threatens the gradual disintegration of the national forests and the removal of jurisdiction over the national forests by the Federal Government?

The bill (H. R. 23293) "for the protection of the water supply of the city of Colorado Springs and the town of Manitou," as amended in the Senate, where it passed on February 3, 1913, will, if enacted, practically prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from administering that part of the Pike National Forest.

It embraces an area of many thousand acres of forest land and many improvements erected thereon by the Federal Government. In the last three years the experiment station alone has cost more than $30,000.

As shown by the reports on this bill, the arrangement to have the Secretary of Agriculture administer the areas in cooperation with the municipalities was entirely satisfactory to them.

The amendments in section 3 should be defeated.

Your consideration of the matter will be appreciated by the American Forestry Association.

Sincerely, yours,

P. S. RIDSDALE,
Executive Secretary.

No movement, however commendable, no measure, however necessary, even though it may affect the lives and health of 100,000 people, is permitted to stand for a moment against the determination of this bureau to absolutely control and administer in all their aspects the forest reserves of the great West. And here, upon the threshold of the enactment of a measure which has been pressed upon the attention of the National Congress for the past three years, comes this final protest, based upon the unsupported assertion that its enactment will threaten, if it passes, the gradual disintegration of the national forests.

I want to say, Mr. President, that even if it had that effect—which I absolutely deny—the bill should appeal to the conscience and the justice of every Member of Congress in both Houses, because it is designed to give to two great communities the means of preserving their own health and their own welfare by enabling them to preserve their water supply from contamination. It is just such interferences as these, just such protests as these, that cause many people of the West to hate and to loathe the very name of conservation.

The people who inhabit these two cities are among the best, most intelligent, highly educated, and wealthy of the State of Colorado. They have the best of reasons for insisting upon the enactment of this measure. One can readily understand, by bringing the lesson home to himself, what his own opinion would be of a system containing so much of good and so much of benefit, when its administration is accompanied by such petty interferences and tyrannies as result from or attend its practical operation in the various sections of the West.

Now, let me call attention to another illustration of the manner in which the conservation policy is administered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I may interrupt the Senator, by whom is the letter signed?

Mr. THOMAS. It is signed by P. S. Ridsdale, executive secretary.

I have spoken of the acts of 1866 and 1870, I think, recognizing and confirming rights of way for the diversion of water over the public domain. The Supreme Court has frequently had occasion to treat these rights and to confirm them expressly as vested rights, as property rights. The Roaring Fork Electric Water & Power Co.—I think that is the name of it—is a corporation organized many years ago for the purpose of supplying the city of Aspen, in Pitkin County, Colo., with water and with power, and supplying the mines in that section with power as well. Its plant was completed in 1891, and consists of an appropriation of water and a flume or canal leading from the point of diversion to the reservoir of the company, about 2 miles of which now lie within the boundaries of the Mount Sopris Forest Reserve—a reserve created years after the right had been acquired. This company, like many others, raised the money necessary for the completion of the enterprise by an issue of bonds, secured upon the plant, including the reservoir and the right of way.

I think no one will deny that that company has an absolute, positive, vested, property interest in that right of way by availing itself of a privilege given by the laws of the United States, an easement the existence of which is so clearly recognized and safeguarded that every patent issued by the Government of the United States excepts it from the operation of the grant.

But 12 months ago the Forestry Bureau demanded of this company that it should take out a permit or lease from the Government for the use of its own vested right of way across an insignificant corner of the Mount Sopris Reserve, and in effect notified the company that failing to do so it might be ejected. Conferences developed the fact that the amount demanded was so nominal as to be almost ridiculous, always accompanied, however, by the condition that at any time the Government saw fit to do so—and by the Government I mean the bureau—these terms and conditions could be changed or the grant or privilege terminated absolutely.

Of course the company was advised that it could not afford to recognize this demand, because it necessarily involved an admission that the title to this vested interest, in so far as it was included within the boundaries of the forest reserve, belonged to the Government of the United States and not to the corporation. The company offered to submit the matter to the courts upon an agreed statement of facts, but the bureau has so far declined to accept the proposition. A few days before I left the city of Denver for the city of Washington I received in my mail a copy of a letter from the head of the department in Denver to the manager of the company notifying him, in effect, that unless this permit was taken out, and taken out at once, the Government would unloose its engines of legal war and invoke the court to enforce the demand of the Forest Bureau, which every man of ordinary intelligence knows to be as unjust as it is unlawful.

I might repeat instances ad nauseum of similar character. I appeal to Senators from other States whether, if these practices prevailed in their own Commonwealths, they would not, as we do, insist that some change should be made at least in the method of administration of this policy? I justify my opposition to this measure from the State of Connecticut, because it is a part and parcel of this same system of administration, claiming the right to exercise the same authority, and justified by the same appeal, to wit, that all of these things are necessary for the prevention of monopolistic conditions.

I shall not detain the Senate, Mr. President, by any further instances illustrating the unfortunate methods which are sometimes resorted to in the supposed administration of this great public trust.

Let me say, in conclusion, that if this policy had been adopted and adhered to from the beginning of the Government, there would have been neither population nor settlement to speak of west of the Allegheny Mountains. On the contrary, that region would have remained practically undeveloped and uninhabited, or developed and inhabited by an alien people. The tendency of the American people has been westward, obeying some great instinct or impulse of human nature driving them onward. The Government in other days, wisely recognizing that impulse, and encouraging instead of opposing it, opened wide the doors of opportunity, and said not only to Americans, but to all men, "Go out and occupy and possess the domain of the country and improve it, to the end that its latent wealth may be quickened into being and contribute to the greatness and the glory of the Republic."

Responding to that privilege and that impulse, the march of empire has always been westward, to the Mississippi River and across it, through the great States of Iowa and Missouri. It has traversed the plains of the Great American Desert, converting it into one of the most prosperous and happy sections of the country, covered with a teeming population of men and women and children, anchored to the soil, having a stake in the progress and welfare of the Nation—citizens constituting that great middle class which the President of the Republic of Mexico once told me was absolutely essential to the success of republican institutions everywhere, and without which popular government is impossible.

In the section known as the public-land area of the country there is a great population. It has overcome obstacles compared with which those of the Mississippi Valley were almost as nothing. It has traversed areas that were practically without water or the means of livelihood, and has settled up the valleys and slopes of that great mountain region. The products of those States are enormous, but their growth is arrested by a governmental policy which visits the sins of monopoly upon its own citizens and endeavors to correct the evils and abuses springing out of the laws of Congress and their methods of administration by denying opportunities to the hundreds of thousands of people who are anxious to improve and devote them to the common welfare. When a people like ours are face to face with these bureaucratic conditions you can well understand that their currents of resentment may sometimes overflow the confines of prudence and of moderation.

Let me say, Mr. President, that the greatest element of conservation in this country or anywhere else is the conservation of men and of women and of children. They constitute the great asset of the Nation. We must conserve them, to do which we must utilize the resources of the Nation now and wisely and honestly and for the common benefit.

No country in the world was ever possessed of the resources and the natural wealth that have blessed and have been so conspicuous in America. Yet all those resources were here before, just as they have been since, until the white man came. The Indian was your true conservationist. He was here long before we were here. No laws, conservative or otherwise, restrained him. He was a child of nature, and lived from hand to mouth, as barbarians always do. Natural resources made and could make no appeal to his untutored mind. It was but natural, therefore, that he should have retired before the advancing hosts of the white man, whose energy and capacity had been conserved through centuries of struggle and therefore of growth and development. When the white man came in contact with these forces of nature, the union of the two made possible the growth and the population and the development of this mighty Nation. And now, in this twentieth century of man's advancement, out in the solitudes of these great reserves we find the same conditions that confronted the Indian at the time this country was first populated, with the difference that the white man is there desiring to develop them, while the conserving hand of bureaucracy lays its interdict upon him.

Conservation that does not conserve both the man and the thing is not that conservation which, in my judgment, should be the policy of this great Nation.

If, therefore, we of the West permit, without protest, aggressions of this sort, beginning in the waters of the Connecticut River, we can not expect that the Government will halt in its continuation of that policy with us, notwithstanding the fact that the conditions of nature and of environment are so radically and essentially different.

Hence I oppose this measure, because of the so-called principle which is its underlying foundation and which seems to me in its consequences to be injurious to the people of the entire country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I desire to ask him a question. I understood that the Senator from Arizona was going to submit some remarks upon the pending bill at some time, and I rose to ask him if it would be convenient for him to proceed this evening.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I can not proceed this evening, both on account of my throat and my head. I should prefer not to do so. I do not know that I will take the time of the Senate at all, but certainly I do not feel inclined to proceed this evening.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry before making a motion. We are proceeding upon the legislative day of Tuesday. I wish to inquire whether that fact involves any question about our right to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, which is the ordinary time for convening on a calendar day. I have been informed, I do not know whether correctly or not, that when the Senate is upon a legislative day it is the custom to recess to an hour just prior to the time of convening on a regular calendar day. If that has been the custom, it was broken yesterday when we took a recess until 12.40 p. m. to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is not necessary, although it is customary, simply to avoid all question. The Chair does not think it can be a matter of doubt as to the right of the Senate to take a recess to any hour it may see fit and prolong the legislative day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would give rise to no complication if we took a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, though the Senator may name some other hour if he prefers it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 28283. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914; and

H. R. 28699. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the ages, our fathers' God and our God, who hath never forsaken Thy children, continue to bless, guide, and protect us. We thank Thee that the name of Abraham Lincoln, the world's great commoner, will not only be hallowed to-day by the people of his country, but by all the liberty-loving people round the world. We can not exalt him, but we may exalt ourselves by keeping his memory green and by striving earnestly to follow his illustrious example. We thank Thee for the special order of the day, which illustrates in a preeminent degree the integrity of the American people in selecting a President and Vice President. Let Thy blessing, we beseech Thee, follow the outgoing President, that he may continue to be a faithful servant wherever he is called to serve. And we most fervently pray that the incoming President may be attended by Thy grace, mercy, justice, and truth; that the laws of the land may be faithfully executed and the affairs of state wisely administered; that the ties of peace between us and other peoples may be strengthened and peace and prosperity reign throughout our borders, and everlasting praise be Thine. In the spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 27876.

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, and I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk his memorable speech made 50 years ago at Gettysburg.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent to have read the Gettysburg speech of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. I reserve the right to object, for the purpose of making an inquiry. If the time is consumed between now and 1 o'clock in the reading of this address, it will not interfere with the order?

The SPEAKER. Not a particle. It will not take 10 minutes to read the address, anyway. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the Chair will designate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to read the address. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] rise?

Mr. GRAHAM. As this is the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, and as I come from his old home and the district he once represented in this body, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House on the subject of Abraham Lincoln after the reading of the Gettysburg speech.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. GRAHAM. Well, 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] asks unanimous consent that after the Gettysburg address is read he may have 30 minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to give notice that when the proceedings by unanimous consent are finished I shall move to proceed with the regular order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], from the Springfield district, where Abraham Lincoln is buried, to have 30 minutes in which to address the House after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] has read the Gettysburg oration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that I propose, when the unanimous-consent proceedings are over, to move to dispense with the regular order of the day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will proceed.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Clerk's desk, read as follows:

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE DEDICATION OF THE CEMETERY AT GETTYSBURG, NOVEMBER 19, 1863.

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great Civil War, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

[Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 30 minutes.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the growth and development of a nation it would be difficult to overestimate the value of great examples, of high ideals, and one of the compensating benefits we derived from the Civil War is the long list of heroic actions of magnanimous and noble deeds performed by men on either side.

Never before in the history of the world did the vanquished exhibit greater valor, and never did the victor in a great war treat the vanquished with such splendid generosity as in that titanic struggle. No Roman triumph marked the final victory. Napoleon's standards waved at one time or another from the citadels of almost every capital in continental Europe. The Germans took literal possession of conquered Paris, but Grant turned from Richmond at its very gate. No humiliating terms were imposed at the surrender of the great Confederate commander. He received the courteous and chivalric treatment which brave men always accord to brave men. Perhaps the greatest moment in the life of the silent commander was when asked at Appomattox what disposition was to be made of the horses of the Confederate cavalry, which were mostly owned by the men who rode them, and he replied in his quiet way, "Let them keep them; they'll need them for the spring plowing."

Deeds of personal heroism were so numerous that it would be invidious to mention any particular ones. There were, indeed, giants in those days. That awful struggle was in truth a struggle of Titans. But out of it all one great gaunt figure rises and stands above the others like a cedar of Lebanon, towering beyond his fellows in massive grandeur, unique, alone, for in the whole field of profane history there is neither prototype nor parallel for Abraham Lincoln.

I was not always an admirer of President Lincoln. When a boy the first book I read about the Civil War was Pollard's Lost Cause, which was published in Richmond before the heat of the conflict had time to cool.

But later in life a number of circumstances conspired to attract me to a study of the career of this wonderful man, this first American, as Lowell called him.

For many years I have lived within a stone's throw of his old home in Springfield. He once represented in Congress the district I now have the honor to represent, and the fourteenth of April, the anniversary of his martyrdom, reminds me of the too frequent recurrence of my own birthday anniversary.

I have loved to talk of him with the few men still left in Springfield who knew him and admired him long before the general public appreciated him. I have marveled at a career which far outdistances romance. Many a time have I traveled with him in spirit over that long and weary journey from the Kentucky cabin to the White House. I have tried to understand him, to estimate his character, only with this result, that as my own vision broadened I saw in him new strength, new wisdom, new self-control, new elements of greatness, till he became to me, as Stanton said of him, "the most perfect ruler of men the world had ever seen," and I am forced to the conclusion that in the providence of God he was destined to be the savior of the Republic, the preserver of government of the people, by the people, for the people. [Applause.]

Having said this much, you are not surprised to hear me say that I regard Abraham Lincoln as one of the world's greatest men.

What is the real test of greatness? How is greatness to be weighed or measured? By what method is it to be determined?

If a man's greatness is to be measured by the service he rendered his fellow men, then indeed was Lincoln great.

If we accept the criterion that he that ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city, still was Lincoln a great man.

If the ability to recognize and understand right principles and to stand for them and stand by them, in gloom and defeat as well as in sunshine and victory, is a sign of greatness, still was Lincoln great.

If absolute and abiding faith in the ultimate triumph of that which is right because it is right is a sign of greatness, he had it.

If the broadest charity, the greatest magnanimity, the most complete absence of the spirit of resentment is an evidence of greatness, then was Lincoln superlatively great.

If a deep, strong, boundless, active, and abiding sympathy for all those who labor and are heavy laden is an evidence of greatness, he had it in a degree approached by few other human beings.

Unbounded courage, unwavering determination, unlimited capacity to work and to suffer are essentials of greatness. Lincoln had them all in a remarkable degree.

Nor were these admirable qualities marred by any vice or weakness, barring a supposed weakness resulting from his excessive human sympathy.

He was absolutely unselfish; he had in him no element of cupidity; he was incapable of the feeling of mere revenge, and his greatest ambition was to be right and to be of service to his country and to humanity.

Who can be named who had all these qualities in such degree as this rail maker of the Sangamon? If we are to measure greatness by the power to accomplish, by the conquest of obstacles, by difficulties overcome, whom can you name fit to be compared with this untaught and unaided child of the forest and the prairie?

The so-called "ladder of fame" furnishes us with at least a figure of speech by which we are wont to measure and compare the achievements of the great. Let me use that rhetorical figure for the purpose of a brief comparison between Lincoln and some of the great ones of the earth whose names fill the pages of the histories and whose fame comes ringing down the ages.

I will not attempt more than mere suggestion, but I invite you at your leisure to go into the details and ascertain what each did for himself and what others did for him; where each began his individual career of accomplishment and where he ended it; in other words, how far he traveled, through his own efforts, on this strenuous and toilsome journey up fame's ladder.

Let me illustrate what I mean by citing just a few of the names of the world's great which at once occur to anyone—Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon.

Alexander was the son of a great monarch and heir to a kingdom. He had all the advantages position could give. He had as his private tutor the philosopher Aristotle, one of the greatest intellects the world has known. At the age of 20 his father's death placed him on the throne of Macedon. Thus, without any special personal effort, he found himself, before he reached his majority, far up fame's ladder.

Cæsar was of patrician birth and had both wealth and family influence behind him. He enjoyed the benefit of the best schools, and official preferment awaited his desire. His family connection and social position enabled him to begin life well up fame's ladder.

Charlemagne was a worthy descendent of the famous Charles Martel, a King of France. He was, in truth, a great empire builder, but he, too, was born well up the ladder of fame.

And Napoleon, that wonderful man of destiny, was the son of a general, a graduate of one of the greatest military schools of the time. Others prepared him for the opportunity he seized so promptly and utilized so completely.

Nor is our own land without illustrations. Washington had all the advantages that wealth and station could give, and Jefferson added to these advantages a thorough college training.

So that all these, through inherited advantage, began their life work well up fame's ladder. But what of Lincoln? What advantage of birth or wealth or environment had he? Absolutely none. He was born on the frontier in a log cabin 14 feet square. His parents were poor, shiftless, and ambitionless, and the father tried hard to repress his son's desire for knowledge. He lived till manhood amid the poorest and most depressing surroundings, away from schools and schoolmasters, enjoying only eight meager months of school opportunity in his entire life.

He did not start in the race halfway up fame's ladder, not even within sight of it. He had to clear away the brush and traverse the swamps and overcome innumerable difficulties to get within view of it; and these difficulties he overcame, not because of his surroundings, but in spite of them, till he finally planted his feet on the lowest round and, without influence or assistance, began the toilsome ascent.

And who will say that any of those favored sons of fortune climbed higher than he?

If my theory be sound, if we are to measure the greatness of the man by the distance covered from start to finish in life's journey, whom can you recall who began so low, and, of his own strength, rose as high as Abraham Lincoln?

The opinion is quite too prevalent that Lincoln's greatness developed after his election to the Presidency. That is a mistake. The truth is he was always great, but it was, of course, after his election that the people were convinced of his greatness.

While he was fond of office and was somewhat persistent in seeking it, he never sacrificed, or even modified, his opinions in order to gain it.

He was a real leader of public opinion; he never changed his views to be in accord with that opinion. When the public differed from him he set to work to win the public to his view.

As early as 1837 he filed a written protest against slavery in the Illinois Legislature, of which he was then a member, being joined by but one other member. Nothing could at that time be more unpopular, as he well knew.

Just prior to the debate with Douglas, when he prepared the Springfield speech in which he used the illustration that "a house divided against itself can not stand" he submitted it to a number of his personal and political friends and admirers. They were almost stunned at his rashness in using this biblical quotation. They felt that it would kill him politically, but in spite of protest, regardless of results, he used it, and time has surely vindicated his sagacity and his courage. The men who knew him in those days say that it was habitual with him to draw out the views of others on political subjects while he withheld his own. Even in those days he had supreme confidence in himself. But it was not mere pride of opinion that made him so self-confident, for he did not hesitate to adopt the views of others when it seemed wise to do so.

His supreme self-confidence and his intense patriotism are evidenced by his choice of a Cabinet. A smaller or less patriotic man would have hesitated to choose as his adviser one who almost held him in contempt or one who was generally supposed to so far outclass him as to cast him altogether in the shade.

I never heard of anyone who so grievously offended Lincoln as did Mr. Stanton, but that did not prevent him from making Stanton Secretary of War.

Few other men could have borne the conduct of Secretary Chase as Lincoln did under intolerable provocation, but he realized Chase's value to the country and made all else subservient to that; and later, in spite of his disloyalty to his chief, Lincoln appointed him to the highest place within his gift—Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He placed at the head of his Cabinet his chief rival for the presidential nomination, Mr. Seward, and quietly tolerated Seward's assumption of superiority, confident that time would determine their relative positions, as indeed it soon did to the Secretary's complete discomfiture. Lincoln felt intuitively that he had nothing to fear from comparison with any man. He was, therefore, entirely devoid of envy or jealousy, first, because of this supreme and abiding confidence in himself, and, second, because he was ready at any time to adopt the views of others if they seemed sounder than his own.

The breadth and depth of Lincoln's charity passes ordinary comprehension. The sight of misery in man or beast touched him profoundly.

I believe he spoke with absolute sincerity and out of the fullness of his great heart when in his second inaugural he urged Congress to proceed "with malice toward none, with charity for all."

His patience, his justice, his honesty, his sincerity conquered everyone who really knew him. Douglas, his rival in love, in the law, and in politics, pronounced him the honestest man he ever knew. Wendell Phillips, who bitterly assailed him because he was not an abolitionist, finally declared that he was "God given, God led, and God sustained." Seward, who at first thought lightly of him, lived to refer to him as "a man of destiny with character made and molded by divine power to save a nation," and Stanton, whose treatment of him when they first met was almost contemptuous, truly said, as the gentle spirit left the body, "Now he belongs to the ages." The rail splitter, the flatboat hand, had conquered them all, and the conquest was complete and enduring. [Applause.]

Our country has been abundantly blest in the fact that it owes everything to the common man, nothing to aristocracy or royalty. What an array of names—Columbus, Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln—all springing from the common people, but none of them quite so near the common clay as this child of the frontier, this—

> Kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man,
> Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
> New birth of our new soil, this first American.

Truly does the poet say he was new birth of our new soil. Generations separated him from the ways and the amenities of cultivated society. He was so close to nature that, as another poet well says of him:

> The color of the ground was in him—the red earth;
> The tang and odor of the primal things;
> The rectitude and patience of the rocks;
> The gladness of the wind that shakes the corn;
> The courage of the bird that dares the sea;
> The justice of the rain that loves all leaves;
> The pity of the snow that hides all scars;
> The loving kindness of the wayside well;
> The tolerance and equity of light that gives as freely to
> The shrinking weed as to the great oak flaring in the wind—
> To the grave's low mound as to the Matterhorn
> That shoulders out the sky.
>
> * * * * * * *
> And when the step of Earthquake shook the house,
> Wrenching the rafters from their ancient hold,
> He held the ridgepole up and spiked again
> The rafters of the Home. He held his place—
> Held the long purpose like a growing tree—
> Held on through blame and faltered not at praise.
> And when he fell in whirlwind, he went down
> As when a kingly cedar green with boughs
> Goes down with a great shout upon the hill,
> And leaves a lonesome place against the sky.

Abraham Lincoln was the very incarnation of the spirit of democracy, of the rule of the common people. His thoughts were their thoughts, their joys were his joys, and their sorrows were his, too. His sad, deep-furrowed face was so marked with melancholy that he seemed to bear all the burdens of his people.

What a man, and what a career! Just look for a moment with the eyes of your imagination and behold this awkward, barefoot, backwoods boy at ten trying to do a man's part in the woods with his ax; living in a forest hut entirely open on one side; at night dragging his tired frame to his attic nest of leaves by climbing on pegs driven into the logs, to find himself ere morning sleeping under a coverlet of snow; walking miles to borrow a book and lying prone on the floor to read it by the light of the blazing pine knots; wading waist deep through the wintry waters of a creek to rescue a worthless dog; guiding a flatboat down the Mississippi; making rails to fence the little farm on the Sangamon for his father and stepmother before leaving them to make his own way in the world, before starting out at twenty-two on the quest for the road leading to that figurative ladder on which he was destined to climb so high. Again see him start from Springfield on a flatboat trip to New Orleans; see him find a way to extricate the stranded boat when older and more experienced men fail, just as later on, in affairs of greater moment, he always found a way; see him as grocer's clerk treating all with rigid, scrupulous honesty, walking three miles before breakfast to bring to a customer the modicum of tea which the accidental use of a wrong weight deprived her of the evening before; see him postmaster, with the mail in his hat, and see him laying away at the end of his term the very pennies which belonged to the Government, to be produced years afterwards when called on for a settlement. Step by step see him progress on the toilsome way, now storekeeper, now surveyor, soldier, politician, and lawyer, but ever and always faithful student, good citizen, and honest man. [Applause.]

Then see him arrive in Springfield at the age of twenty-eight, bringing with him little credit, and less money, and riding a borrowed horse. See him gradually rise, gaining steadily in public estimation. See him in the State legislature and in Congress, and when the question of slavery extension becomes acute see him challenge for a joint discussion his opponent for senatorial honors, the ablest debater of his day, Stephen A. Douglas, the Little Giant of the Prairie State. The whole civilized world knows the result of that debate.

Like a skillful general Lincoln so directed the course of the contest that he lost a skirmish in order to win a battle. He was beaten for the Senatorship only to gain the Presidency.

On May 18, 1860, he was nominated by the national convention of his party at Chicago, and duly elected in November. On the 11th of the following February he departed from his Springfield home never to return alive.

I can see in imagination the parting scene. In a pouring rain he stood bareheaded on the coach platform at the old Wabash depot and bade good-by to his friends and neighbors. Listen to him:

My friends, no one not in my situation can appreciate my feeling of sadness at this parting. To this place and the kindness of these people I owe everything. Here I have lived a quarter of a century, and have passed from a young man to an old man. Here my children were born, and one is buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him I can not succeed. With that assistance I can not fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me and remain with you and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. To His care commending you, as I hope in your prayers you will commend me, I bid you an affectionate farewell.

[Applause.]

How touching, how sincere, how full of faith in God. And the language itself—how rhythmic, how direct, how simple it is. Where did this man, who scarcely entered the schoolhouse and knew not the college or the university, get this magnificent, this perfect command of language? How and where and when did he master that elusive thing called style so thoroughly that some of his letters and speeches adorn the walls of great institutions of learning as specimens of perfect English? Let me read to you his letter to Mrs. Bixley, which both graces and adorns a wall of Oxford University as a specimen of perfect composition:

DEAR MADAM: I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the adjutant general of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any words of mine which should attempt to beguile you from a loss so overwhelming, but I can not refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice on the altar of freedom.

Yours, very sincerely and respectfully,

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

[Applause.]

His Gettysburg address is conceded to be the best short speech in the language, but short as it is and excellent as it is, I shall not now ask you to listen to it. Indeed, were I to indulge in quoting specimens of his eloquence, I should find no reasonable stopping place. I can not, however, resist the impulse to quote the prophecy which concludes his first inaugural:

I am loath to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

[Applause.]

And may I not also recite the hymn with which he closes his second inaugural?—

With malice toward none, with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the Nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all things which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

[Applause.]

What rhythm, what majesty, what patriotism!

If we did not know that his spare moments from boyhood up were given to the study of the Bible and to the companionship of Æsop and Bunyan and Defoe and Burns and Shakespeare, we might well exclaim as did the doctors and the scribes of old concerning Him who spake as man never spake, "Whence hath this man letters, having never learned?" But we know that his mastery of his native tongue, the only one he knew, did not come unsought. It was acquired by persistent and resolute effort, and was tinged and tempered by the tenderness of a nature filled with love for God and man and country. It reflected his patience, his fortitude, his fidelity, his absolute fairness and sense of justice, as well as his courage, sincerity, and resolution. In short, with him, as with every master of diction, the style bespoke the man.

Almost forty-seven years have come and gone since the fateful night when the hand of a poor deluded lunatic, without a moment's notice or a word of warning, struck him down. What a shock he gave the world and what a cruel wound he thus inflicted on the torn and bleeding Southland! By that blow he struck down the only man who had the strength and the will to stay the ruthless hands of those greedy and unscrupulous adventurers who, at the close of the war, promptly proceeded to plunder the stricken South. I give it as the opinion of his lifelong friends in Springfield that Lincoln never lost his love and sympathy for his native Southland, and that had he lived he would never have permitted the reign of robbery and ruin which that fair land experienced in reconstruction days. The hand, the only hand, which had the strength to save them was paralyzed in death by one who vainly imagined he was aiding their cause.

As for Lincoln, it was far beyond the poor power of the assassin to rob him of one tittle of his fame. Indeed, he added the one thing needed, if anything were needed, to enshrine his memory forever in the hearts of the American people, and that was the martyr's crown. And for this he chose, most opportunely, the moment when his victim had reached the summit, nay, the very zenith of his fame.

The war was practically over. The dove of peace hovered over the land. The Union was saved. Government of the people, by the people, and for the people had not perished from the earth. The ship of state was safe at anchor. The shackles were struck from the limbs of four million slaves. And the people gave Lincoln credit for it all. The world was filled with the sound of his praises. His feet were on the topmost round of fame's ladder. Millions of his countrymen would cheerfully have laid down their lives to save his life. There was little glory left for him to gain, and then, lest he trip and stumble, fate closed and sealed the splendid record.

With what dramatic force Walt Whitman tells the pathetic story:

O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is won.
The ship has weathered every rack, the prize we sought is won.
The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting.
But Oh heart! heart! heart!
  Oh the bleeding drops of red,
    Where on the deck my Captain lies,
      Fallen cold and dead.

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;
Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle thrills,
For you bouquets and ribboned wreaths—for you the shore's acrowding,
For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;
Here Captain! dear father!
  This arm beneath your head!
    It is some dream that on the deck
      You've fallen cold and dead.

My captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,
My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,
The ship is anchored safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,
From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won!
Exult, Oh, shores, and ring, Oh, bells!
  But I, with mournful tread,
    Walk the deck my Captain lies
      Fallen cold and dead.

In the very heyday of his fame he fell at the post of duty; and so we shall always think of him as he was at his best, not a single shadow, not a single blur, not a single flaw in the picture.

As the years file slowly past, as we get further and further away from his time and see him in clearer and truer perspective, his splendid moral and intellectual proportions, his patience, his fidelity, his sense of justice, his foresight, his charity, his patriotism—in a word his greatness—become more and more apparent.

In a spirit of patriotic devotion, imbued with a feeling of profound gratitude for the blessing of a reunited country under the old flag, let us reverently bless God that He vouchsafed us such a captain to direct the ship of state at such a time. [Prolonged applause.]

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The SPEAKER. It is customary for the House to rise when the Senate comes into the Chamber. Gentlemen in the first four rows of seats at the right of the Speaker will please vacate their seats and accommodate themselves elsewhere.

At 1 o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the President pro tempore and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by their Sergeant at Arms and headed by their President pro tempore (Mr. BACON) and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The President of the Senate pro tempore took his seat as the presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives, in obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in compliance with the concurrent resolution adopted pursuant thereto, the Senate and House of Representatives are now met in joint convention for opening the certificates and ascertaining and counting the electoral votes in the election for President and Vice President of the United States. The tellers previously selected on the part of the Senate and those selected on the part of the House will please take their places at the desk.

Senators DILLINGHAM, of Vermont, and MARTINE, of New Jersey, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Representatives RUCKER, of Missouri, and YOUNG, of Michigan, the tellers on the part of the House, took their places at the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. With proper respect for the high function which we now perform in the presence of the American people, and with due regard to the decorum which should mark so important and solemn an occasion, it is not deemed proper that there should be applause or manifestation of approval or disapproval during any stage of these proceedings. This has been the rule upon similar occasions in the past, and it is confidently expected that it will be scrupulously observed upon this occasion, both upon the floor and in the galleries.

The Chair will now open and place in the hands of the tellers the certificates in the alphabetical order of the States, showing the electoral vote of each State. Unless there be objection, the reading of the formal portions of these certificates will be dispensed with, and the tellers will read, count, and announce the vote as shown by the certificate from each State.

There was no objection.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. The tellers will now read, count, announce, and make a list of the electoral votes from the State of Alabama.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (one of the tellers). The certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama seems to be regular in form and properly authenticated, and it appears therefrom that Woodrow Wilson has received 12 votes for President of the United States, and that Thomas R. Marshall has received 12 votes for Vice President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. Is there objection to this certificate? None being offered, the tellers will proceed to read, count, and announce the vote of the State of Arizona.

The tellers then proceeded to read, count, and announce, as was done in the case of Alabama, the electoral votes of the several States in their alphabetical order; and in each case objections, if any, were called for by the presiding officer.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. All of the certificates having been opened and read and the votes counted, the tellers will make a list of the same and report the result to the presiding officer.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (one of the tellers). The undersigned, WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM and JAMES E. MARTINE, tellers on the part of the Senate, and WILLIAM W. RUCKER and H. OLIN YOUNG, tellers on the part of the House of Representatives, report the following as the result of the ascertainment and counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, 1913:

WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
JAMES E. MARTINE,
Tellers on the part of the Senate.
W. W. RUCKER,
H. OLIN YOUNG,
Tellers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore. By the report of the tellers and the list made by them of the electoral votes cast, as shown by the certificates from the several States, it appears that the state of the vote for President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate pro tempore, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 531, of which a majority is 266.

Woodrow Wilson, of the State of New Jersey, has received for President of the United States 435 votes.

Theodore Roosevelt, of the State of New York, has received 88 votes.

William Howard Taft, of the State of Ohio, has received 8 votes.

The state of the vote for Vice President of the United States, as delivered to the President of the Senate pro tempore, is as follows:

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice President of the United States is 531, of which a majority is 266.

Thomas R. Marshall, of the State of Indiana, has received for Vice President of the United States 435 votes.

Hiram W. Johnson, of the State of California, has received 88 votes.

Nicholas Murray Butler, of the State of New York, has received 8 votes.

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate pro tempore shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1913, and shall be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives, the purpose for which the convention assembled having been accomplished, the presiding officer dissolves this joint convention, and the Senate will retire to their Chamber.

The Senate retired from the Hall, and (at 2 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Speaker resumed the chair and called the House to order.

RECESS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 4043, as passed by the House yesterday afternoon, be printed for the use of Members and placed in the document room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, four years ago the House, by unanimous consent, took a recess for five minutes in order that the chairs temporarily placed in the Hall for the seating of Senators might be removed and the Members' seats replaced.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask that that be done now?

Mr. MANN. I suggest that to the majority side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 2 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request for unanimous consent that the bill "An act (S. 4043) divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases," passed yesterday, be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 4043 be printed as a House document. Is there objecion?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if he has consulted with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], chairman of the Committee on Printing?

Mr. WEBB. I have not. I could not find him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then I shall be forced to object.

Mr. MANN. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina. What he wants is more copies of his bill, I suppose.

Mr. WEBB. I want it printed as a House document. They can be procured in the document room of the Senate, but not in the House document room.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia object?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following order and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on next Friday, February 14, the House shall stand in recess from the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. until the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., at which time it shall be in order to consider, only in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to, beginning with House resolution 643 (Private Calendar 225) and continuing until the end of the Private Calendar is reached, after which it shall be in order to consider the remainder of said calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman where this leads us in regard to the 36 bills that were objected to?

Mr. POU. The order provides that the calendar shall be taken up where the House left off last Monday night, and that the remainder of the bills on the calendar shall be called. After the calendar is disposed of, if the House desires to consider other bills, if there is no objection, it can do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. GARNER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a continuing order, and will it take us over into Saturday in case the bills are not disposed of on Friday night?

The SPEAKER. The House would have a right to adjourn, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 24121. An act to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties and other claims; and

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion comes too late. The Chair has announced that it was Calendar Wednesday and that the House would automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That is the time for the gentleman to make his motion. There are five minutes' debate on each side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. On this call 256 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with proceedings in order to-day under the rule, so that we may facilitate the transaction of the public business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with proceedings in order to-day under the Calendar Wednesday rule. The gentleman from New York has five minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I called the attention of the House to the condition of the public business, and it is quite apparent that it is necessary that we continue to consider the appropriation bills if they are to be enacted at this session of Congress. There are now on the calendar waiting to be taken up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill and the pension appropriation bill, and there are still to be reported the naval appropriation bill, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the general deficiency appropriation bill.

I wish to remind this side of the House that our opponents have at times charged that the Democratic Party has adopted certain changes in the rules of the House which make it impossible effectively to transact the public business. While I did not favor certain of the changes that were made, I believe it is possible for this side of the House promptly and efficiently to discharge the public duties devolving upon them under these present rules if they will undertake to do so. In order to do so, however, it is necessary to do what has always been contemplated, and that is, at a time like this, at this stage of the session, the important public business be given preference over all other business. If for any reason any of the general appropriation bills should fail at this session of Congress, our opponents will use it as an argument to criticize and denounce what they will term the inefficiency and incompetency of the Democratic Party. I have no desire to accomplish anything except to promote and facilitate the public business, and in view of the situation, of what happened last Wednesday, and from what I can gather is likely to happen to-day unless we proceed to consider the general appropriation bills, I am convinced that this day will be as fruitless in results, so far as the transaction of the public business is concerned, as was last Wednesday. I hope that this side of the House will determine to devote the balance of this day to the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that in my judgment we could have completed the bill now on the calendar within the time consumed in the call of the House. On yesterday an appropriation bill passed through the House in one hour, and I congratulate the chairman of that committee and the committee itself on having that bill in such good shape when it came in to the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] knows as well as I know that we are going to put these appropriation bills through before this Congress adjourns. Certainly we are. We are going to have night sessions, as we ought to have and will have. If gentlemen really want to oppose this measure, they will have the opportunity to do so, and I am perfectly willing to have them do so and the committee is willing to have them do so.

But this bill, I want to say to the gentleman, is a part of the public business. This Government, through its Congress, solemnly passed through this House and the Senate a resolution directing the President of the United States to invite the nations of the earth to an exposition to be given in honor of a great American project. That invitation has been extended, and 24 nations have accepted it and are waiting now to see what our Government will do about its own exhibit. My judgment is, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not provide for an exhibit the nations of the earth will not come with their exhibits. Would you blame them if they did not? This bill has already been discussed at length. We can go into the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule and finish the bill in a little while. It can be amended and perfected as gentlemen desire to see it amended and perfected. I want the House to take action and let the country and the world know what we are going to do. We ought to do that.

I want to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we boast that this is the greatest country on the earth, and it is. [Applause.] We have invited the nations of the earth to come here and join us in celebrating the greatest engineering feat of all time, and I want the nations of the earth to come here and behold the blessings and benefits enjoyed by the greatest people in all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the motion of the gentleman from New York will not prevail. [Applause.]

I desire to print in the RECORD the committee report on this bill and a letter from the Louisiana delegation on this subject.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 1358, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. CULLOP, from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 27876:

The Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27876) to provide for the participation of the United States in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

Page 4, in line 17, after the word "board," insert a colon and the words:

"Provided, That any one or all of the buildings hereby authorized to be erected shall be of a permanent and suitable character for the use of the Government on said military reservation."

Page 5, in line 5, after the word "States," insert a comma and the words "within 30 days after the passage of this act."

Page 5, in line 10, strike out the words "as soon as convenient" and insert in lieu thereof the words "within 30 days."

Page 6, in lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "or with foreign exhibitors regarding space, location, and the awarding of premiums; and" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the commissioners of foreign Governments and said Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. whenever a formal request for such action is made by any foreign commissioner; and said commission."

Page 7, in line 2, after the word "premiums," insert the words "salaries and expenses herein provided for."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide for the participation of the United States in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and for other purposes."

The President, in his message communicated to Congress on December 19, 1912, made the following reference to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition:

"In conformity with a joint resolution of Congress, an Executive proclamation was issued last February, inviting the nations of the world to participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Francisco to celebrate the construction of the Panama Canal. A sympathetic response was immediately forthcoming, and several nations have already selected the sites for their buildings. In furtherance of my invitation, a special commission visited European countries during the past summer and received assurances of hearty cooperation in the task of bringing together a universal industrial, military, and naval display on an unprecedented scale. It is evident that the exposition will be an accurate mirror of the world's activities as they appear 400 years after the date of the discovery of the Pacific Ocean.

"It is the duty of the United States to make the nations welcome at San Francisco and to facilitate such acquaintance between them and ourselves as will promote the expansion of commerce and familiarize the world with the new trade route through the Panama Canal. The action of the State governments and individuals assures a comprehensive exhibit of the resources of this country and of the progress of the people. This participation by States and individuals should be supplemented by an adequate showing of the varied and unique activities of the National Government. The United States can not with good grace invite foreign Governments to erect buildings and make expensive exhibits while itself refusing to participate. Nor would it be wise to forego the opportunity to join with other nations in the inspiring interchange of ideas tending to promote intercourse, friendship, and commerce. It is the duty of the Government to foster and build up commerce through the canal, just as it was the duty of the Government to construct it.

"I earnestly recommend the appropriation at this session of such a sum as will enable the United States to construct a suitable building, install a governmental exhibit, and otherwise participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in a manner commensurate with the dignity of a Nation whose guests are to be the peoples of the world. I recommend also such legislation as will facilitate the entry of material intended for exhibition and protect foreign exhibitors against infringement of patents and the unauthorized copying of patterns and designs. All aliens sent to San Francisco to construct and care for foreign buildings and exhibits should be admitted without restraint or embarrassment."

The exposition is to be a celebration of a national achievement of world-wide importance. The cost of the celebration, however, is not borne by the United States, but by the people of California. Of all the international expositions held in the United States the Panama-Pacific International Exposition is the only one that has not asked for aid from the Government, and the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. has pledged itself not to ask for such aid. The exposition is amply financed, over $20,000,000 having been provided by California and its people.

In response to the President's invitation 25 nations have already officially notified the Department of State of their intention to participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. These countries are: Argentina, Bolivia, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Great Britain (provisionally), Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Portugal, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, and Uruguay.

In September last, after the expiration of the period of mourning for the late Emperor of Japan, the commissioners from Japan appointed for that purpose selected the site of the Japanese buildings and gardens at San Francisco, within the grounds of the Presidio Military Reservation set apart for foreign exhibitions. The commissioners announced that the Japanese Government would expend more than $1,000,000, and that at the close of the exposition the buildings and gardens would be presented to the Government and people of the United States as a testimonial of good will.

The Governments of China, Canada, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Brazil, and Sweden have sent commissioners to San Francisco to select sites for their buildings. Some of these sites have been chosen, and the work of preparing for construction and installation is in active progress. The French commissioners have asked for a reservation of 8 acres, and will arrive soon to confirm the selection. The Department of State is in receipt of communications from our representatives abroad, indicating that many other countries are preparing to accept the invitation to participate and to erect buildings.

Meanwhile, great interest is manifested in the exposition by the States of this Union. Thirty-five States have officially decided to make exhibits of their resources and activities, and the legislatures of the remaining States are now considering the subject. Many of the States have already selected the sites of their buildings and commissioners are at work arranging for construction.

Individual applications for exhibit space have been received from all parts of the world. The amount of space already applied for exceeds the allotment. Therefore, the process of selection and elimination has already begun, with the object of making the exposition a compact and complete epitome of the world's activity rather than a mere huge aggregation of exhibits.

The size and character of foreign government participation, as well as the extent of participation by the American States, will be affected largely by the attitude of this Government toward the exposition. It can not be expected that foreign nations will enter enthusiastically into this universal undertaking if its sponsor—the United States—is half-hearted or niggardly. Congress appropriated $1,579,000 for a Government exhibit at St. Louis, in addition to an outright gift of $5,000,000 and a loan amounting to $4,600,000, which loan was repaid. The pending bill provides for an appropriation of $2,000,000 for a Government exhibit at San Francisco, with a provision that the building or buildings shall be of a permanent character, suitable for the use of the military authorities at the Presidio Military Reservation, and with the further provision that the United States shall not be bound to extend any pecuniary aid or assistance to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. This appropriation is regarded by your committee as moderate and suitable, and in accordance with the dignity of the United States as a host of the nations of the world.

The bill provides that the Government exhibit shall be in charge of a board of Government employees, appointed by the heads of the executive departments, the independent commissions and bureaus, the Smithsonian Institution, etc. The exhibit as a whole will illustrate the functions and activities of the National Government, showing the nature and growth of our institutions and their adaptation to the wants of the people, and the progress of the Nation in the arts of peace and war. Comparatively few citizens of the United Staes have an opportunity to visit the National Capital, and still fewer are able to gain a comprehensive idea of the manifold operations of their Government. By means of the exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition the people of the country will be enabled to obtain accurate information regarding the methods of government, the expenditure of the public funds, and the development of national institutions. In no other way could this desirable object be accomplished to such good advantage.

The bill provides that a commission shall be appointed by the President to act as a board of arbitration in case of differences arising between the exposition authorities and foreign Governments of exhibitors, and to require suitable provision to be made for the entertainment of the representatives of foreign nations who may visit the exposition in response to the invitation heretofore extended by the President by authority of Congress. The salaries and expenses of this commission are to be paid by the exposition company, and no expense whatever in this connection is to be borne by the National Government.

Your committee beg leave to commend the public spirit and generosity of the people of California in assuming the entire burden of financing and managing this universal exposition, and to emphasize the fact that the participation by the Government to the extent provided for in this bill is barely more than a formal recognition of its duty in the premises.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1913.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: The Louisiana delegation asks you to kindly read this short statement in regard to the Panama Exposition. New Orleans contested with San Francisco for the honor of being selected as the exposition city. San Francisco won.

New Orleans contended that an international exposition without foreign exhibits would not be a success and that foreign nations would not exhibit unless the United States had an exhibit of its own and a commission representing the authority of the Government. San Francisco believed that a successful exposition could be conducted without these provisions.

Recent developments have demonstrated that New Orleans was right and that San Francisco was wrong. Some of the leading foreign nations are hesitating about accepting our Government's invitation to participate until the United States provides for its own exhibit and appoints a Government commission with which foreign nations can deal.

Whether San Francisco erred when it stated that it would not ask for a national exhibit, or whether it used the argument for the purpose of obtaining a material advantage over its competitor, should not be considered at this time. It is essential that a national exhibit be authorized and adequate appropriation be made to secure the participation of foreign powers, without which the exposition must fail; and we urge that no right-thinking American will contribute to such humiliation.

The citizens of Louisiana and the entire country want the exposition to be a success. Our national prestige is at stake. We have invited foreign nations to be our guests, and we must not fail in our duty. New Orleans is anxious to help her late rival to make the exposition a success, and we urge upon Congress the absolute necessity for a Government exhibit and the creation of a Government commission.

The question is not local, but national. The mere fact that San Francisco made a mistake two years ago does not justify Congress in now making the mistake of refusing to do what is absolutely necessary to insure a successful exposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 72.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Seventy-two gentlemen have risen—a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 121, answered "present" 5, not voting 121, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he voted "Present."

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay." I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SCULLY, and I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. BROWNING was called, and he voted "Present."

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. RICHARDSON, and if he has not voted I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. THISTLEWOOD was called, and he voted "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative, the motion to dispense with Calendar Wednesday is rejected, and the House resolves itself——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be considered as closed, and that we take the bill up immediately under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be considered as closed, and that when the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House it be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COLLIER, Mr. SISSON, and Mr. MANN objected.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate upon this bill be considered as closed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move as an amendment that further general debate on the bill be limited to two hours and a half.

Mr. SHERLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it in order, the House having refused to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, to do anything than to go into Committee of the Whole automatically for the consideration of business?

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and, if the Chair ruled the other way, they never would get through with it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the rule require it?

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole automatically, and it is in exactly the same position then as when a gentleman gets up ordinarily and moves to go into Committee of the Whole. The Chair has ruled that way three or four times, and he believes it is right.

Mr. MANN. On my amendment I ask for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois amends the motion, or offers to amend it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And, Mr. Speaker, I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Had you not better have the previous question apply to them both?

The SPEAKER. You must take them one at a time. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] moves that the debate be considered as closed.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to speak four or five hours.

The SPEAKER. This question is not debatable, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves that the general debate close in two hours and a half, and on that he moves the previous question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. And I make a preferential motion to lay that on the table.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest to the gentleman that he move the previous question on both the motion and the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have moved the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I moved that the general debate be considered as closed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to limit general debate to two hours and a half. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves the previous question——

Mr. MANN. On my amendment.

The SPEAKER. And on that the gentleman from Massachusetts moves to lay it on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If the previous question should be ordered, or whether it is ordered or not, does the previous question cover the amendment only?

Mr. MANN. That is all the previous question covers. I moved the previous question on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] simply moves the previous question on his own amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move the previous question on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that in a minute.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama should have opportunity to move the previous question on both.

Mr. MANN. He had an opportunity to do that and did not do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama had an opportunity to do that and did not do it, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did it, as far as he wanted to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, another parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If the previous question should be ordered and the amendment disposed of, then I will ask whether the gentleman from Alabama would be recognized to promptly move the previous question on his motion, and, if ordered, whether he would not thereby cut off an infinity of business?

The SPEAKER. He could if he were quick enough.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. As I understand it, the gentleman from Alabama made a motion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] amended it. Would it not be in order now to move the previous question on the original motion and the amendments?

The SPEAKER. Not now. It would have been at one time, but it is now too late, and the gentleman from Massachusetts—to finish the statement of that situation—moved to lay the gentleman's motion on the table.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. To lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. COOPER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is a preferential motion and not an amendment to either of the other motions.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is preferential.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEFLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on the table. If that motion prevails, what situation would the original motion be in?

The SPEAKER. That kills his amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. And leaves the original motion as it was?

The SPEAKER. No. The original motion would go to the table with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. Under parliamentary law an amendment in the third degree is not permissible, but there is only one amendment before the House.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. That is the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to have the general debate run two hours and a half, and on that he moves the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Why is it not in order to amend that still further and have the previous question apply to the original motion and to this amendment?

Mr. MANN. Because the previous question has been demanded on my motion.

The SPEAKER. What the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] suggests could have been done at the proper time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. If the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to lay on the table should carry, would that take with it the bill and everything else connected with it?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I submit, as a part of the parliamentary inquiry, whether the motion to lay upon the table the amendment does not also take the motion of the gentleman from Alabama which is sought to be amended, and lay that upon the table?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. WEBB. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order that that is clearly dilatory.

Mr. MANN. That is dilatory.

Mr. WEBB. It is not dilatory.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It looks like it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to adjourn. That is the highest motion that can be made in this House.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WEBB. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, the Speaker announced 41 ayes, not a sufficient number.

Mr. WEBB. I demand the other side.

The negative vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. On ordering the yeas and nays, the ayes are 41 and the noes are 115. More than one-fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 77, nays 183, answered "present" 6, not voting 115, as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. DIXON of Indiana with Mr. HAUGEN.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. CURRY.

Mr. CONRY with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia with Mr. GUERNSEY.

Mr. HULL with Mr. WEEKS.

Mr. HOLLAND with Mr. HAWLEY.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana with Mr. HARTMAN.

Mr. REILLY with Mr. DANFORTH.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as recorded.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from North Carolina swept everything out of the way temporarily by his motion to adjourn, there were three or four parliamentary inquiries pending, one by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], one by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and one by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. The Chair will answer them all at once. In the first place, if the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to lay on the table, which comes first, carries, that carries the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and with it the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama to close the debate. It does not carry with it the bill. It has nothing to do with the bill. If the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts fails, then the vote comes on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on ordering the previous question, and then the vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the Gardner motion to lay on the table should be agreed to, thereby carrying the Heflin motion to limit debate, would it then be in order for the gentleman from Alabama to again be recognized to move to close debate at once?

The SPEAKER. No, not at once; but it would be to close it in one minute or three hours, or any time between. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] to lay the Mann amendment on the table.

Mr. MANN. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 111, answered "present" 6, not voting 134, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. BATHRICK with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. CLAYTON with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. JONES with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. PALMER with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. REDFIELD with Mr. LOUD.

Mr. ROTHERMEL with Mr. HARTMAN.

Mr. WEBB with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama with Mr. VARE.

Mr. HART with Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear my name called, though I was about here. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening, when his name should have been called?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I believe I was in the Hall. I do not know whether I was in the Hall in time. I tried to get over in time from the House Office Building.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. BERGER. I do not know about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, inadvertently I voted "yea" on this roll. I wish to withdraw that vote and vote "present," as I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD.

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I now move to close debate in three hours, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. MANN and Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. MANN. That is right. I was just going to make that motion myself.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, it must be clear to everyone in the House——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order on a motion to table.

Mr. GARNER. Then I desire to make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold that motion to be dilatory.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the Speaker to hold, at 20 minutes of 5 o'clock, when a motion has been made that we have three hours of debate, and another motion to lay that motion on the table has been made, that a motion to adjourn is dilatory?

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that at this stage of the session, with the business in the condition that it is, at 20 minutes of 5 o'clock in the evening a motion to adjourn is dilatory. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that debate close in three hours, and on that motion he demands the previous question. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] moves to lay that motion on the table. The question is on the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 119, noes 81.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 113, answered "present" 3, not voting 132, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. LINDSAY with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado with Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado with Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi with Mr. VREELAND.

Mr. GOEKE with Mr. PRINCE.

Mr. SHARP with Mr. MERRITT.

Mr. AYRES with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. KINDRED with Mr. PROUTY.

Mr. CLARK of Florida with Mr. GREENE of Vermont.

Mr. BRANTLEY with Mr. DANFORTH.

Mr. HARDWICK with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I desire to withdraw my vote, because I am paired, and ask to be recorded as answering "present."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate close in five minutes, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

Mr. MANN. I wish to be heard upon that.

The SPEAKER. Upon what?

Mr. MANN. Upon the point of order which the gentleman has made.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman desires to be heard on?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin made a point of order that some motion was dilatory—I suppose the motion which I made to lay on the table. Now, Mr. Speaker, the House has just laid on the table two motions, and to say that a proposition to lay a third on the table is dilatory is wild imagination. If the House had refused to lay on the table a former motion, it might with some justice be claimed that a motion to lay on the table a third time was dilatory; but when the House has laid two of these propositions—one to close debate instantly, one to close debate in three hours—on the table, it seems to me that the House has shown its disposition to not endeavor to close debate at all.

Mr LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MANN. If it is a parliamentary question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. It is a question touching the argument of the gentleman. Is it not a fact that the House has twice shown that it wants to vote on the main question involved and that——

Mr. MANN. It has not, because if it had even the gentleman from Oregon would not have voted to lay the main question on the table if he wanted to vote on it, and he so voted twice.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The parliamentary skirmish here is to avoid voting on the main question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is dilatory, and every man in the House believes the same. [Applause.] The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 89.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays on the previous question will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighty-five gentlemen have risen, a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 117, answered "present" 1, not voting 149, as follows:

The name of Mr. OLMSTED was called, and he voted "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would withhold that motion for a moment, until the House can transact some routine business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. DIES, for 3 days, on account of illness.

Mr. DANFORTH, indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. DONOHOE, for 10 days, on account of illness.

RESIGNATION FROM A CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a letter he has received from Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, of Oklahoma, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 12, 1913.

To the Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Owing to the necessity of my being absent from the House of Representatives on important business during the next 10 days, I respectfully ask to be relieved from serving on the conference committee on the part of the House of Representatives on H. R. 23293, and ask you to substitute in my place Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, of Colorado, the next ranking member on the committee, and oblige,

Yours, respectfully,

SCOTT FERRIS.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will be excused from service on the conference committee, and the Chair will appoint Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in his place.

There was no objection.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on Friday next, February 14, the House shall stand in recess from the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. until the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., at which time it shall be in order to consider only, in the House or in Committee of the Whole, bills on the Private Calendar which were not considered and objected to on Monday, February 10, after which it shall be in order to consider the remainder of said calendar.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman from North Carolina desired to ask that bills which were not objected to on Friday night should be considered with a view to giving every Member with a bill on the Private Calendar an opportunity to bring it before the House on a kind of unanimous-consent private calendar.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to modify the order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks leave to modify the order.

Mr. POU. I submit the order in a modified form.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on Friday next, February 14, the House shall stand in recess from the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. until the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., at which time it shall be in order to consider, by unanimous consent only, in the House as in Committee of the Whole bills on the Private Calendar which were not considered or objected to on Monday, February 10, after which it shall be in order to consider the remainder of said calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under that order, as I understand, bills on the Private Calendar will be called and the question raised whether objection has been made to them, as it has been made heretofore.

Mr. POU. That is the object of the order. It was intended that it should be drawn that way.

The SPEAKER. The intention or this order is to enable the House to proceed exactly as the House proceeded on Monday night, beginning where it left off then. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it the understanding that the diplomatic and consular bill shall come up the first thing to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why not make it 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will make it 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF SENATE BILL 4043 RELATING TO INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], chairman of the Committee on Printing, I renew the request that there be printed as a document Senate bill 4043 as it passed the House. There is not a copy to be had in the document room of this House or of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to have it printed in bill form?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS FOR SCHOOL SECTIONS IN GOVERNMENT RESERVATIONS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Hon. Walter L. Fisher, Secretary of the Interior, relating to the bill (S. 5068) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes. The Committee on Public Lands have made a report, and this is an important letter relating to that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to Senate bill 5068. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 11, 1913.

Mr. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: My attention has been recently called to S. 5068, being a bill "to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes."

The general purpose of this bill is similar to H. R. 19344. The Senate bill as amended was passed by the Senate August 15, 1912. The matter of exchange, the subject of these bills, has been the subject of several previous reports from this department addressed to your committee. The bill as passed by the Senate seems to safeguard the public interests, and I would recommend its passage if the last proviso is stricken from the bill. Thereby it is provided: "That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the State of Idaho."

This is a general exchange measure authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to make exchanges of lands within the several States for those portions of the land granted in aid of common schools, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, which lie within the exterior limits of any Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, the exchange to be made in the manner and form and subject to the limitations and conditions of sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of February 28, 1891 (36 Stat., 796). The department has heretofore made exchanges of this sort under sections 2275 and 2276, as amended, and, as before stated, believes the sections above quoted ample authority therefor, even though this legislation should fail.

The necessity for the bill results from an opinion by Judge Wellborn in the case of Hibbard v. Slack (84 Fed. Rep., 371), in which it is held that an act of February 28, 1891, amending sections 2275 and 2276, Revised Statutes, does not contemplate an exchange of lands between the State and the United States, but only indemnity for loss to a State because of inclusion of school lands within a forest or other reservation prior to their identification by the Government survey. Although this decision has never been followed by the Land Department in the administration of the school grants to the several States, it has nevertheless been thought by interested parties that the passage of this legislation would greatly relieve the situation. When it is remembered that the department has heretofore made these exchanges under the sections above quoted and has exchanged with the State of Idaho already about 350,000 acres, that there are at least that many additional selections pending unacted upon, and that the present bill merely authorizes exchanges in the manner and subject to the conditions and limitations of those sections, the effect of the last proviso to the bill as passed by the Senate can readily be appreciated. Assuming that it may not affect exchanges heretofore made—that is, carried into effect by final approval and acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior—it would certainly raise the question as to whether further exchanges of this sort were permissible with the State of Idaho.

The State, by its legislature, in 1911 authorized its officers to make exchanges of this sort with the United States and ratified and approved all previous exchanges made or applied for. The purpose in including this proviso, therefore, can not be understood; but should the bill be passed retaining the proviso, I would not feel free to make further exchanges of this sort with the State. I therefore earnestly recommend to the consideration of your committee the advisability of eliminating this proviso. With its exclusion, however, as hereinbefore stated, I think the public interest will be preserved, and I should recommend its early enactment.

Very respectfully, WALTER L. FISHER, Secretary.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, in accordance with the order previously made, until to-morrow, Thursday, February 13, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Galveston Harbor and adjacent waterways, Texas (H. Doc. No. 1390); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Savannah River at North Augusta, S. C. (H. Doc. No. 1389); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Terrys Creek and Back River from the mouth to its junction with Mackeys River, tributary to Brunswick Harbor, Ga. 4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, referring to Senate bill 8369 to donate the Old Exchange Building in Charleston, S. C., to the Daughters of the American Revolution and advising Congress that the building is now used by the Lighthouse Service (H. Doc. No. 1388); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

R. 26189) granting certain coal lands to the city of Grand Junction, Colo., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1511), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SWEET, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26648) for the relief of David Crowther, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1510), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:
